HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

OPPOSITE THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

THACKERAY HOTEL

Great Russell Street, London.

NEAR THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

KINGSLEY HOTEL

Hart Street, Bloomsbury Square, London.

Passenger Lifts, Electric Light throughout,
Bathrooms on every Floor,
Spacious Dining, Drawing, Writing, Reading, Billiard
and Smoking Rooms. Heated throughout.

Fireproof Floors, Perfect Sanitation. Telephones. Night Porters.

BEDROOMS (including attendance) from 3/6 to 6/0.Inclusive Charge for Bedroom, Attendance, Table d'Hôte,
Breakfast and Dinner, from 8/6 to 10/6 per day.

FULL TARIFF AND TESTIMONIALS ON APPLICATION.

Telegraphic Addresses { Thackeray Hotel—"Thackeray, London."
Kingsley Hotel—"Bookcraft, London."

FOREIGN HOTELS.

WIESBADEN.HOTEL NASSAU. With fine Bathing Establishment. Situated at the Curplace. "The English Home."ST. MORITZ, ENGADINE.THE BELVEDERE. High-class English Family Hotel, in the finest and sunniest position. Inclusive terms 11 to 20 francs.

BOOKSELLERS.

Our Offer THE S.S. WORKER'S BIBLE*6/-

for 3/6

Postage 4d.

Abroad 8d.

Containing a selection of the best Aids to Bible Study, most suitable for a Young Teacher or Elder Scholar.
Good, clear type, portable size. Size, 5½ by 4½ by 1½ inches, with references, concordance, atlas, illustrations of antiquities, etc. Handsomely bound in limp Morocco, overlapping edges, round corners, red under gold edges, elastic band, each Bible in box.
This Bible can be had with new thumb index on edge, at 1s. extra.

THE LONDON BIBLE WAREHOUSE,
53, Paternoster Row, E.C.BOOKS. Ancient and Modern, Bought, Sold and Exchanged.*THOMAS THORP, 100, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.
(And at READING.)MONTHLY CATALOGUES FREE.Mr. Thorp has incorporated the business in Review Books carried on for many years by Mrs. Hindley at Booksellers' Row, and at the above address.J. POOLE & CO., 104, Charing Cross Road, LONDON.

School, Classical, Mathematical, Scientific, and Students'

BOOKSELLERS.

NEW AND SECOND-HAND.

All enquiries as to Prices of Books in our VERY LARGE STOCK answered.UNITARIAN CHRISTIANITY.EXPLANATORY PAMPHLETS, AND CATALOGUE OF BOOKS ILLUSTRATIVE OF LIBERAL RELIGION, SENT POST FREE.UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION,

ESSEX HALL, ESSEX STREET, STRAND, W.C.

BOOKS WANTED.—£20 each offered. Guy Mannering, 1st edit., 3 vols.
1815, in boards uncut. Thackeray's Vanity Fair, 20 Nos., 1847-48. Vicar of Wakefield, 2 vols., Salisbury, 1766. Walton's Angler, 1653. Paradise Lost, 1667.
Lamb's Shakespeare Tales, 2 vols., boards, 1827, 30/- each offered for. Scrope's Salmon Fishing, 1843. Gardiner's History of England, 2 vols., 1863. Ireland's Napoleon, 4 vols., coloured plates. Jesse's George Selwyn, 4 vols., 1843. Books with inscriptions written inside by Carlyle, Meredith, Keats, Lamb, &c. All books with coloured plates by Ackerman, &c. Special list of wants free, high prices paid. Please let us know your wants. We can supply everything.—HOLLAND BROS., Book Experts, 21, John Bright St., Birmingham.
[Bargain, Harmsworth's Encyclopædia, 10 vols., 21/- cost £2 16s. net.]

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

LONDON.WILD'S TEMPERANCE HOTELS. J. B. Wild, C.C., Man. Direc.
30-40, Ludgate Hill, E.C.; 70 & 71, Euston Square, W.C.AT BOURNEMOUTH HYDRO.

IDEAL RESIDENCE.

Sun Lounge. Every form of Bath.

BOURNEMOUTH.THE QUEEN, Bath Road. Miss Tye.
Central. Board and Residence, 35/6 to 3 guineas weekly.

NEWLYN'S (Royal Exeter) HOTEL, Close Pier; 1st Class; Moderate.

SILVER HOW. Boarding Est. West Cliff Gdns. From 30s. week.

BRIDPORT (Near West Bay), DORSET.

BOARD RESIDENCE. Every Comfort. 10, West St., Bridport.

BRIGHTON.

THE HOTEL METROPOLE. E. Richard, Manager.

ROYAL YORK HOTEL. H. J. Preston.

BUXTON.

ST. ANN'S HOTEL. First Hotel.

DARTMOOR—YELVERTON.

THE TORS HOTEL. Tel.: 0199. Mrs. F. Sara.

BARON'S TEMPERANCE HOTEL. Magnificent Moor Views.

DEAL

BEACH HOUSE HOTEL. S. R. Jefferson.

EASTBOURNE.

CLARENCE Private Hotel & Boarding House, Sussex Grdns. 5/- day.

HADDON HALL, Devonshire Place, overlooking Sea. 5/- day.

EXETER.

DELLERS CAFE. Cathedral Close, and at Paignton.

GREAT YELDHAM—ESSEX.

THE WHITE HART HOTEL. Proprietor, W. Pearl.

HENLEY-ON-THAMES.

RED LION HOTEL. Overlooking famous Regatta course.

ILFRACOMBE.

COLLINGWOOD PRIVATE HOTEL. 120 Rooms. Facing Sea.

LEEDS.

HOTEL METROPOLE, 2 minutes' walk from either station.

LIVERPOOL.COMPTON HOTEL, Church Street. Wm. Russell.
Telegrams: "Compton." Telephone: 3032 Royal, 3 wires.LLANELLY.

CLEVELAND HOTEL. J. T. Weaver.

MALDON.

TEMPERANCE HOTEL, Market Hill. C. Simons, Manager.

MALVERN.

HARDWICKE PRIVATE HOTEL. Prop. & M'g'r.—J. Wilson.

MANCHESTER.

THE PRINCES CAFE. Oxford Street.

THE DEANSGATE HOTEL. Deansgate.

MATLOCK.

SMEDLEY'S Hydropathic Establishment. Estab. 1853. H. Challand, Mnger.

ROCKSIDE HYDRO. Tennis, Bowls, &c. Nr. Golf Links. (18 holes).

OXFORD (near).

SUNNINGWELL HALL, Boars Hill. Dry, Sunny, Golf, etc. Lecture

PENTRE.

PENTRE HOTEL, Rhondda. Tel. No. P.O. 30. W. H. Miles.

PLYMOUTH.

GOODBODY'S CAFES. And at Torquay.

SWISS CAFE, Union Street. Moderate. Genoni Bros.

PORTSMOUTH.

SPEEDWELL HOTEL. A. Grigsby, Managing Director.

SOUTHSEA.

STRATHEARN MANSIONS, South Parade. Miss Collis, Manageress.

ST. MORITZ, ENGADINE.BELVEDERE, high-class English Family Hotel. Situated i sunniest and finest position. Inclusive terms 11 to 20 francs.SWANAGE.

"CRAIGSIDE," Board Residence. Tel.: 6. Misses Fell.

TEIGNMOUTH.

REGENT RESTAURANT & Criterion Hall for Catering. W. H. Bonner.

WHITBY.

WEST CLIFF PRIVATE HOTEL. Mrs. T. Newbitt.

WOODFORD GREEN, ESSEX.

WILFRED LAWSON. Temp. Hotel, J. J. Blundell Manager.

EDUCATIONAL.

COUNTY OF LONDON.

The London County Council invites applications for the post of NON-RESIDENT LECTURER IN HISTORY AND GEOGRAPHY at Avery Hill Training College, Eltham. The person appointed will also be required to supervise the school practice of students in the principal subjects of the elementary school course.

The salary attaching to the post will commence at £180 a year, and will rise by annual increments of £10, subject to satisfactory service, to a maximum of £250 a year.

Applications should be made on Form T.S. 56, to be obtained, together with particulars of the appointment, from the Clerk of the London County Council, Education Offices, Victoria Embankment, W.C., to whom they must be returned, not later than 11 a.m., on 16th March, accompanied by copies of three testimonials of recent date.

All communications on the subject must be endorsed "Lecturer in History and Geography," and a stamped addressed envelope must be enclosed.

Canvassing, either directly or indirectly, will be held to be a disqualification for employment.

Full particulars of appointments in the Council's service are given in the "London County Council Gazette," which is published weekly, and can be obtained from the Council's Publishers, Messrs. P. S. King & Son, 2 and 4, Great Smith Street, Westminster, S.W., price (including postage), 1½d. an issue, or, for the year, a prepaid subscription of 6s. 6d.

G. L. GOMME,

Clerk of the London County Council.

Education Offices,

Victoria Embankment, W.C.

February 20th, 1908.

BOOTHAM SCHOOL, YORK.

(Under the Management of the Society of Friends.)

Twenty-six boys passed University Entrance Examinations in 1906 and 1907.

A new feature for post-Matriculation students is a CITIZENSHIP COURSE, including Economics and Modern History with special reference to existing political institutions and social problems.

The School continues to hold a strong position in Leisure-Hour work:—Natural History, Archaeology, Carpentry, etc.

For copies of prospectus and full particulars with regard to scholarships, apply to the Head Master, Bootham School, York.

Head Master: Arthur Rowntree, Certificate of Distinction in the Theory, History, and Practice of Education, Cantab.

THE HINDHEAD SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Principal: Miss J. F. GRUNER, Certificated Student of Girton College, late Second Mistress, Dulwich High School, G.P.D.S.Co. Education thoroughly modern; physical training and outdoor games. Great attention is paid to healthful conditions of life. The boarding-house stands at an elevation of 800 ft.—For prospectus address to BRACKENHURST, HINDHEAD, HASLEMERE, R.S.O.

THE LEYS SCHOOL, CAMBRIDGE.

ENTRANCE SCHOLARSHIPS IN MARCH.

Preparatory School at Hitchin recognised by the Governors. Enquiries should be addressed to the BURSAR.

INFORMATION AND ADVICE AS TO SCHOOLS.

THE SCHOLASTIC, CLERICAL, AND MEDICAL ASSOCIATION, LTD. (a body of Oxford and Cambridge graduates), gives advice and assistance without charge to Parents and Guardians in the selection of schools (for GIRLS AND BOYS) at home or abroad, and as to Tutors (ARMY, NAVY, UNIVERSITY, &c.). A statement of the requirements should be sent to the Manager,

E. J. BEEVOR, M.A., 22, Craven Street, Trafalgar Square, W.C. Telegrams: "TRIFORM, LONDON." Telephone No. 1854 GERRARD

SEASIDE SCHOOLS FOR GIRLS.

BROADWATER HALL, WORTHING.

Good English Education. Eight Acres of Grounds.

LE PLEIN AIR, DIEPPE.

Languages, Accomplishments, Needlework, Cookery. Principals—THE MISSES TRITTON.

AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE, TAMWORTH.

YOUTHS TRAINED FOR HOME OR COLONIES.

Farm, 1,000 acres. Carpentry, Smith's work. Riding and Shooting taught. Prospectus.

WILLASTON SCHOOL, NANTWICH.

The next Entrance Examination will be held at the SCHOOL ON MARCH 31st.

For particulars of admission on the Foundation, apply to the Head Master.

EDUCATIONAL.

CO-EDUCATION.

ST. LEONARD'S SCHOOL, BALDOCK, HERTFORDSHIRE, has been Opened for BOYS and GIRLS.

PRINCIPAL—MRS. ENNIS RICHMOND.

(Author of "Boyhood," "Through Boyhood to Manhood," etc.)

HEAD MASTER—MR. KENNETH RICHMOND.

"A Natural Education" and "For Our Daughters." Lectures given by Mrs. Richmond on the Co-Education of Boys and Girls may be had from Messrs. G. Street & Co., Ltd., 42, Albemarle-street, London, W. Price 3d. each; single copy 4d., post free.

SCHOOL OF SOCIOLOGY AND SOCIAL ECONOMICS,

63, 64, Denison House, 296, Vauxhall Bridge Road, S.W.

SIX LECTURES on SOME SOCIOLOGICAL PROBLEMS IN THE UNITED STATES will be given by MR. J. GRAHAM BROOKS President, American Social Science Association at 4.30 p.m. on consecutive Tuesdays, beginning March 3rd. Course ticket, 5s. Single admission, 1s. Further particulars may be had from the Hon. Secretary

MISCELLANEOUS.

Curio Club
Bargains

Private persons desirous of disposing of antiques at bargain prices will find a ready sale for same at the "London Opinion Curio Club" 107, Regent Street, London, W.

CONVENIENT OLD COTTAGE.—Old-world parish. Fine views. Highest part of Essex. Seven small light rooms. Ranges. Two entrances and gardens. Good service of tradesmen. Two posts. Eighty minutes from doorstep to City. £20.—P. 'NATION' Office.

FERTILISERS for HORTICULTURAL USE.—Write for descriptive price list; carriage paid for 4 cwt. and upwards.—Hy. Richardson & Comp., Manufacturers of Artificial Fertilisers, Skeldergate Bridge, York.

The FEBRUARY "BOOK MONTHLY," 6d. net.

CONTENTS.

PERSONAL AND PARTICULAR. A Town and Country Journal of Book Affairs; the same Embellished with many Pictures.

CONTRABAND! Books Seized in His Majesty's Customs.

TREASURE FINDERS! Forged and Faked MSS., and How to Detect Them—By Tighe Hopkins.

SUPPRESSED! Some Book Pictures that we Know no More.

A LONDON LETTER. New Lamps for Old at the "Times" Book Club—By the Editor.

ANNALS OF PRINT. Four Centuries of the Cambridge University Press.

A BY-WAYS SERIES. The Bookseller and the Publisher as Topographer—By R. Cochrane.

LIGHT AND LEADING. New Fact and Current Opinion Gathered from the Book World.

THE GENERAL READER. Snap-Shot Reviews of the Best and Best-Selling Books.

NEW BOOKS NEARLY READY. Particulars of Interesting Volumes Likely to be Published this Month.

BOOKS OF THE MONTH. A Classical Catalogue of the Noteworthy Books, New Editions, and Reprints of January.

Publishers, Simpkin, Marshall and Co., Stationers' Hall Court, London, who, on application, will send a Specimen Copy free.

NOTICE.

THE NATION is published weekly. Applications for copies and Subscriptions should be sent to THE NATION Office, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent Garden.

Terms of Subscription, Including Postage:

HOME, 26s. PER ANNUM. FOREIGN, 30s. PER ANNUM.

Cheques should be made payable to THE MANAGER, THE NATION, and crossed "National Provincial Bank."

Telephone No. Gerrard 4035.

Telegrams: "Nationetta," London.

THE NATION may be obtained from the following booksellers abroad:—

Paris—Galignani's Library, Rue de Rivoli.

Paris—W. H. Smith & Son's Bookshop, 248, Rue de Rivoli.

Nice—Galignani's Library.

Stockholm—Norden and Jephson.

Vienna—Mr. William Frick, Graben 27.

Christiania—The Cammermeyer Boghandel, Carl Johans Gade, 41 and 43.

Melbourne, Sydney, Brisbane, Perth, West Australia—Gordon and Gotch.

Where single Copies can be obtained, and Subscriptions are received.

Pears' soap.

'Bubbles' by Sir John E. Millais, P.R.A.

1886

ALL RIGHTS SECURED.

MATCHLESS FOR THE COMPLEXION.

"THE NATION," with which is incorporated "The Speaker," printed for the Proprietors by the NATIONAL PRESS AGENCY LIMITED, Whitefriars House, London, E.C., and Published by THE NATION PUBLISHING COMPANY, LIMITED, at the Offices, 14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, London, W.C. Registered at the General Post Office as a Newspaper.—SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 29, 1908.

The Nation

VOL. II., No. 23.]

SATURDAY, MARCH 7, 1908.

[PRICE 6D.

Postage: U.K., 4d. Abroad, 14d.

CONTENTS.

PAGE	PAGE
THE DIARY OF THE WEEK ... 809	Austro-Hungary. By W. H. Shrubsole ... 827
POLITICS AND AFFAIRS:—	An Interchange of Compliments. By National Observer ... 827
The Untrodden Field in Politics. By the Right Hon. Winston S. Churchill, M.P. ... 812	POETRY:—
The Joining of the Battle ... 813	The Awakening. By Dora Sigerson Shorter ... 827
Policy and Armaments ... 815	THE WORLD OF BOOKS ... 828
The Obstacle to Woman Suffrage ... 816	Books to be Read ... 828
LIFE AND LETTERS:—	REVIEWS:—
The Careful Man. By John Galaworthy ... 817	A Shelley Affinity. By Professor Dowden ... 829
"The Season" ... 818	Abbé Loisy on the Synoptics ... 829
Spring in India. By Henry W. Nevins ... 819	Napoleon III. a Policeman ... 830
A Shaker of Things ... 820	Books in Brief ... 832
March Grey-Face ... 821	THE WEEK IN THE CITY ... 832
LETTERS FROM ABROAD:—	SPECIAL LITERARY SUPPLEMENT:—
A Sicilian Superman. By Salvatore Cortesi ... 822	The Maid ... 843
THE DRAMA:—	A Scholar Gypsy. By R. B. Cunningham Graham ... 844
A Parable of England. By M. ... 823	The New Poet. By Robert Bridges ... 845
LETTERS TO THE EDITOR:—	The Irish Saints ... 846
The Education Bill. By G. L. Bruce ... 824	A Foreign Critic on the English Stage ... 847
The New Botany. By Frances P. Loosmore, and A. J. B. ... 825	An Italian's Essays for Englishmen ... 848
The Problem of the Lords. By Edwin Hill ... 825	Our City Gardens ... 849
"The Suffragists and the Law." By Christabel Pankhurst ... 826	The Grouping of Flowers ... 850
"Votes for Women and the Liberal Party." By Eliz. B. S. Wilkinson, E. C., and Emily Ashton ... 826	The French Constitutional Bishops ... 850
	Two Colour Books ... 852
	A Bundle of New Tales ... 852

[The Editor will be pleased to consider manuscripts if accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes. He accepts no responsibility, however, for manuscripts submitted to him.]

Diary of the Week.

THE "Times" of this (Friday) morning has been guilty of the outrage of publishing the following letter:

UNDER WHICH KING?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "TIMES."

Sir,—I consider it my duty to ask you to draw the attention of the public to a matter of grave importance.

It has come to my knowledge that his Majesty the German Emperor has recently addressed a letter to Lord Tweedmouth on the subject of British and German naval policy, and it is affirmed that this letter amounts to an attempt to influence, in German interests, the Minister responsible for our Navy Estimates.

The letter is undoubtedly authentic, and a reply to it has been despatched.

In these circumstances, and as the matter has become an open secret owing to the number of persons to whom it has, most unwisely and unfortunately, been made known, I venture to urge that the letter in question, together with the reply, should be laid before Parliament without delay. I am, &c.,

YOUR MILITARY CORRESPONDENT.

March 4th.

* * *

In its leading columns the "Times" declares that it is in a position to confirm the statement of its correspondent that a letter has been addressed by the German Emperor to Lord Tweedmouth "on the subject of British and German naval policy." It suggests that the Kaiser has been "interfering in our domestic affairs by secret appeals to the head of a department on which the national safety depends." It implies that Lord Tweedmouth ought to be shocked at the Kaiser's "implied estimate of his patriotism and his fidelity to his trust." It demands publication of the letter, and has the assurance to add that it hopes "for the credit of British statesmanship it will not be said that the letter is private." Finally, it accuses the Kaiser of attempting by this means to "make it more easy for German preparations to overtake our own."

* * *

An action of this character comes well and fitly from the journal which went near to destroying a political opponent through the weapons of a forger. There is no need to discuss the character of the communication to which the "Times" refers. An evening journal states that Lord Tweedmouth has denied that it contains the slightest reference to the Navy Estimates. It was, of course, of a private nature, and there is a special cruelty and meanness in characterising a communication which was never intended to see the light, which cannot possibly be disclosed, and in which, to put things at their worst, some familiar phrase might be made to bear a meaning remote from the author's mind. The Kaiser's temperament is well known. He is a frank, impulsive speaker and writer. But it is notorious that he has for many months laboured to improve the political relationships between Great Britain and Germany. We utterly disbelieve that he has done so in the way of improper interference. He might, indeed, have complained of such a statement as that recently made in a somewhat notorious letter that he would be glad to hear of Sir John Fisher's resignation. He may have hinted—we strongly hope that he has hinted—at the chance of arrangement and accommodation on naval expenditure. In such a letter there would not only have been no impropriety, but an act of goodwill and good sense, to which the people of this country would, if they knew of it, extend a warm welcome.

* * *

WE are now informed that the letter bore no such construction as the article in the "Times" imputes. But we hope that some questions will be immediately addressed to Ministers concerning it. The "Times" is no longer an organ of first-rate importance in this country, but in Germany it has a character for influence far beyond its true status here. For this reason, the communication will be assumed to have some Ministerial direction behind it; and this, we imagine, will be denied with all the emphasis which Ministers can command. Beyond this, Lord Tweedmouth must be asked to explain how a strictly private letter can have been made known, as the "Times" asserts, to many persons. Who showed it about? Who communicated it, or, as we now know, misrepresented it, to the "Times"? Lord Tweedmouth, as the person to whom the letter was addressed, will be asked for full and strict explanations on this point. We entirely disbelieve the suggestion that it has been submitted to the Cabinet, or is even known by them as a body; and we are quite certain that the publication will miss its perverted purpose of embittering the relations between the two countries.

* * *

THE King paid the Prime Minister a very special compliment by visiting him at Downing Street on Wednesday, and staying for nearly an hour. This graceful act, which was not required by a necessity of State, was a pleasant example of the relationship existing between the King and a Minister for whom, on personal grounds, he has shown a peculiar regard. As for the Prime Minister's recovery, though it is slow, we are glad to believe that it is steady.

* * *

MR. MURRAY MACDONALD's motion in favour of the "further reduction" of expenditure on the Army and Navy was negatived on Monday by 320 votes to 73, the Government proposing, as an alternative, a practical vote of confidence in itself. The debate was useful, the feeling on the Ministerial side being clearly with Mr. Macdonald. Sir John Brunner held the House with a broad and powerful argument for European peace, which an old and close observer declared to be comparable to an oration of John Bright. Mr. Asquith's defence was on moderate lines. He claimed for the Government a reduction in the cost of the Army and Navy of over 5½ millions as compared with 1905-6, and of 2½ millions as compared with 1906-7. He admitted the importance of the system of peaceful contracts and understandings on which we had entered, said that there was an approach to "mutual understanding" with Germany, and admitted that her naval scheme was witnessed here "without suspicion or apprehension." These words have been received with great friendliness in Germany, where a hint of a naval arrangement has been held out. Our own naval policy, said the Chancellor, was "purely defensive," and there was no need to build against paper programmes—a valuable hint. But the command of the sea was "a matter of life and death to us," and we must be secure against any "reasonable combination." Mr. Balfour did not quarrel with the Estimates as they stood, but insisted on the maintenance of the "two-Power standard," which he did not define, but which really means a two-German standard. He insisted that there was no "inter-dependence" between policy and armaments, and that treaties and processes of arbitration were no substitutes for fleets and armies. This cynical view was rejected by Mr. Haldane, who, though depreciating sole reliance on treaties, said that they "made a profound change for the better." He also refused to accept Mr. Balfour's amendment insisting on the definite maintenance of the two-Power standard, and it was not put to the House.

* * *

BOMB attempts have been made during the last few days on the Shah and the Argentine President. The attempt on the Shah was followed by one upon his intimate friend, the hated ex-prefect, Wesir Maksuss. Both these outrages were the work of secret societies, one of whose members told the "Berliner Tageblatt's" correspondent that it was not desired to kill the Shah, but to frighten him into abdication. His secret intrigues made peace impossible. The situation in the Argentine is very similar to that in Portugal, under the Franco régime. The President, Dr. Figueroa Alenta, was elected two years ago, under the auspices of the Mitrists, one of the two great political cliques—the other is the Ugartists—but last September, on the occasion of the trouble in the province of Corrientes, he revealed his design to break the old parties, and, with the aid of a personal following, to rule autocratically. The parties in Parliament replied by refusing to vote the Budget, so that Parliament should not be prorogued, and the President be free to make the elections next March. The President, thereupon, broke the Constitution by dissolving the Chambers, and putting into force the previous year's Budget. Very bitter attacks are being made upon him, and it is likely enough that the first attempt at assassination may be followed by others. Argentine parties are rapacious and self-seeking; but, with the Portuguese example before us, it would be absurd to expect a political reformation to be forced through, in violation of the Constitution, by a politician whose credentials have not been tested.

* * *

THE situation in Morocco is moving rapidly to a crisis. M. Clemenceau has recovered from the fright in which the coldness of the Chamber put him, and which induced him to suggest a pause to General d'Amade, a recommendation to which the General replied by hanging on another murderous engagement. It has been decided to increase the French forces by 4,000 men, and General Lyautey advises that both Casa Blanca and Bu Reshid, which commands the road to Fez, should be fortified and connected by rail, a scheme which indicates the desire for a permanent occupation. No attempt is to be made to conceal that the operations are now aimed against Mulai Hafid, "to put his legions once for all hors de combat," as the "Times" correspondent phrases it. General Lyautey and M. Regnault have been sent to investigate the situation at Casa Blanca and on the Morocco-Algerian frontier, preliminary, probably, to the recall of General d'Amade, and the speeding up of events. It is possible that the Cabinet has in view the striking of a heavy blow, to be followed by the closing down of operations, for French public opinion is growing still more uneasy, and on Sunday an enthusiastic meeting of 5,000 persons, addressed by M. Jaurès, condemned the Government. This dissatisfaction is shared by all who have business relations with Morocco; and the "Manchester Guardian" has been printing numerous letters from merchants, suggesting organised agitation against French action. It is time that our Foreign Office gave some friendly advice to the French Government.

* * *

THE Zakka Khel expedition has ended so speedily and successfully that everyone may congratulate Sir James Willcocks and Colonel Roos-Keppel on the result. The two brigades of mixed British and Indian troops were concentrated upon the Bazar Valley with rapid secrecy, assisted by the proximity of the mountaineers' home to our base at Jamrud and Peshawar, from which it is not more than a day's march into the hills southwest of the Khyber Pass. Peace has been arranged on the satisfactory basis of common responsibility, shared among the other Afridi tribes, for the good behaviour of the Zakka Khels, always the enfants terribles of the frontier; and it is as pleasant as surprising to hear that, after this arrangement, our force was withdrawn without the usual assault upon the rearguard.

* * *

BUT, after all, we believe, the real victory rests with Mr. Morley, who has succeeded in withstanding the pressure of military "experts," and refused to allow the expedition to develop into a "big show" upon the frontier. There were plenty of authorities, both at home and in India, to urge that a punishment of "raid and scuttle" has no lasting effect; and it is well known in the Indian Army that the highest authority of all has long wished to extend full British occupation and permanent administration up to the Durand line itself. From the point of view of the highest strategy, it is not a question of keeping the hill-tribes from depredation, but of holding the five passes so as to be able to advance without the smallest delay to our ultimate position of defence, which would certainly include Kandahar, and might extend as far north as the Hindu Khoosh. To carry out this strategic policy at the present moment would indeed be to stultify whatever advantage our Agreement with Russia may contain, and yet we cannot doubt that Mr. Morley needed all his resolution to limit our movements to the punishment of a single tribe.

* * *

SIR JOSEPH LEESE carried on Wednesday a motion declaring that the rise in the price of bread was due to natural causes only and could only have been aggravated by an import duty. The object of the motion was to stamp out the silly charge, on which, nevertheless, two elections were largely won, that the rise was the fault of the Government. It was caused, as Sir Joseph showed, by a falling off last year in the world's wheat production of forty-seven million quarters. The crops of India, Australia, and Canada, were all short, and a further fall was stayed by a bumper harvest in Argentina. So that under Preferential Protection, in place of a penny rise in the price of the four-pound loaf, we should probably have had famine prices. Mr. Goulding, the Protectionist organiser, moved an amendment of a directly protective character, for which ninety members, including Mr. Balfour, voted. It called for a "rearrangement" of food duties so as to "encourage" British agriculture, that is to say, to raise food prices at the cost of the British consumer; to give a Preference to the Colonies, that is to say, to raise them at the cost of the British farmer and the consumer; and to "advantage" the consumer, without raising prices either in favour of the British farmer or the Colonial grower! Even Mr. Balfour found this muddle-headed proposition beyond him and sat silent.

* * *

In the course of the debate, Colonel Seely brought out the interesting confession from members of the Opposition that they were prepared to tax corn, though not bread. The "Westminster Gazette," quoting M. Yves Guyot, points out usefully that when the French tax on corn was opposed, the Protectionist Minister, Méline, exempted bread. Thereupon French bakers started bakeries on the Belgian frontier and sent their cheaper bread into France. An equal tax was then imposed on imported bread. In closing the debate, Mr. Lloyd-George showed that the lower price of French bread, which was still dearer by a penny on the four-pound loaf than it is here, had been caused by an exceptionally good harvest, which covered the entire French demand and so stopped automatically all foreign imports. But, as Mr. George said, people could not live for nineteen years without bread in the hope of having a good harvest in the twentieth year.

* * *

THE bye-election at Hastings resulted in the return of Mr. du Cros, the son of the resigning member, by 1,018 votes, against the Unionist majority of 413 at the General Election. A semi-fashionable seaside borough is not precisely the place in which to fight the social issues raised by the Licensing Bill, and the constituency has been sustained for the Messieurs du Cros by influences which are rather social than political. Mr. Robert Harcourt tells the usual story of the absence of Liberal organisation. This is the more serious as the last two years have witnessed the growth of Tariff Reform, and a very powerful and conspicuous spread of Socialism. The popular strength of this latter movement is indicated by the fact that Mr. Victor Grayson has just been elected, in an informal plébiscite, the "favourite member" for Yorkshire, with a majority of 7,000 over the next candidate, a Unionist. It will be specially necessary to organise a great propaganda in support of the Licensing Bill, in answer to that which has already been started by the liquor trade. Such a propaganda should be practical and simple, and should include the house to house methods which have been adopted both by Tariff Reformers and by Socialists. For example, means should be taken to inform publicans of the fact that under Mr. Asquith's scheme they are for the first time admitted to a share in the compensation fund.

THE Free Church Council has held a series of brilliant meetings at Southport. It has, of course, passed strong resolutions in favour of the Education and Licensing Bills, both unanimously. The outstanding feature of the Conference was the address by Mr. Henderson, the new chairman of the Labour Party in Parliament, and a Free Churchman. Mr. Henderson insisted that the Labour Party was not anti-religious or anti-Christian, though, like all parties, it contained men who did not accept Christianity. Its general tendency was to create a humanity in harmony with the Divine economy. The debate showed some conflict of opinion. But the balance inclined to sympathy with labour, and the general tone of the Conference showed, the "Manchester Guardian" declares, a development of Free Church interest in problems of citizenship.

* * *

SIR EDWARD GREY's speech has considerably cleared the way for the conversion of the Congo State into a Belgian Colony, under adequate Parliamentary control. Of course, the King's supporters, popularly known as the "Congophiles," denounce the White-Book as a "diplomatic pamphlet," insist that Belgium must be left to settle the condition of annexation undisturbed by "British pressure," and vow that conferences such as that reported between the Belgian Ambassador and Sir Arthur Hardinge shall stop short of negotiation as to the terms which the British Government will approve. But it is recognised by some Liberals that this "British pressure" is really exerted in aid of the Belgian nation against the King—the attacks on whom have of late been almost beyond belief—and one provincial paper broadly hints that Sir Edward Grey's speech is a blessing in disguise. Behind all this, however, there is a general disposition to accept the situation, reflected in the revised terms published yesterday. The Crown domain is to be made over to Belgium, with the King's properties, valued at £600,000, in the South of France. The State will take over the great building schemes at Laeken, Tervuereu, and Ostend, on the completion of which the King has set his heart. Besides annuities to Prince Albert and Princess Clementine, the King is to receive £2,000,000 in the next fifteen years for "philanthropic and scientific purposes" connected with the Congo. The State will get the King's shares in two monopolist companies, and, therefore, a voice in their control. The Colonial Budget is to be voted by the Belgian Parliament, and there are express guarantees of the protection of native rights. Meanwhile the "Congophobes" are pressing for a postponement, on the twofold ground that the elections next May will indicate the feeling of the electorate, and that it is not yet definitely known what liabilities the annexation will entail on the Belgian State.

* * *

Two peers of some celebrity have died during the week, Lord Hemphill and Lord Linlithgow. Lord Hemphill, who, had he been a little younger, would have been Lord Chancellor of Ireland, lived well into the eighties, and was perhaps the last surviving member of Irish Nationalists of the Liberal school of Isaac Butt. He was a stout, indeed indefatigable, Parliamentary advocate of Home Rule, and was a very fair lawyer. He had a passion for politics, into which he carried a winning sweetness of character and temperament. When seated, his head and figure suggested an odd resemblance to that of Gladstone.—Lord Linlithgow, better known as Lord Hopetoun, who died on Saturday, will be remembered in history as the first Governor-General of the Australian Commonwealth, and a former Secretary for Scotland. Both honours were briefly worn. Lord Hopetoun's tact, good nature, and love of sport made him a favourite with the rather difficult Australian public, but the salary attached to the Governor-Generalship was inadequate, and he resigned it on that ground.

Politics and Affairs.

THE UNTRODDEN FIELD IN POLITICS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—It is a year ago since your enterprise was launched. During the weeks that are gone, THE NATION has maintained a position of sober but unflinching Radicalism, and has steadily acquired a true political significance. The period has been highly favourable to the discussion of large basic questions, and not unfavourable to the progress of social thought. When a Liberal and Radical administration is actually in being, when adventurous and extensive legislative proposals are being canvassed and debated in the country and in Parliament, when any proposal for reform, however utopian, is received with a measure of sympathy and interest, all parties and all persons are forced to turn their minds to these dominant domestic topics. Even the most conservative of mankind are compelled to address themselves to purely social issues. The more active, earnest, or embittered the opponents of Liberal and reconstructive ideas become, the more they are constrained to descend into an arena which we have smoothed and sanded, and engage with weapons and upon ground of which we have made the choice. The consequences of this concentration of many different and conflicting forces upon home questions, far reaching and to some extent incalculable, as they would in any case be, become all the more striking in contrast with the period of foreign and colonial activity to which they have succeeded. They comprise a complete change in political values, in the point of view from which public men judge and are themselves judged, and in the style and language of Parliamentary debate and party tactics.

This considerable revolution has been intimately connected with Mr. Chamberlain's Fiscal propaganda. Until the year 1903, the whole enormous force of the Conservative Party had been continuously exerted in allaying discontent among the masses of the people, in counselling patience, and in extolling the established system of society. Conservative working-men were exhorted to contrast the good conditions prevailing in Great Britain with the evils of foreign lands, to compare the standards of wages and comfort with those of forty or fifty years ago, and to seek relief from any hardships and restrictions incidental to their daily life in the contemplation of the glittering spectacle of Imperial power beyond the seas. The Liberal Party, on the other hand, had been accustomed to dwell on the reverse of the medal, and to urge with varying success the sufferings and injustices of the poor. The irruption of the Tariff Campaign produced automatically a violent shifting, amounting relatively almost to a reversal of these positions. The Conservative Party, through all its organs and from all its platforms, began to raise the cry of discontent and fundamental change. The very forces which had previously restrained, now became a vehement forward impulse. The poor were reminded of their sufferings. The mass of the nation were urged into active protest. On all sides we heard it proclaimed by persons of high rank or substantial wealth, that England was being ruined, that the rewards of industry were unevenly and unfairly distributed, that unemployment was rife and increasing, and that nothing short of an economic revolution would repair the social balance.

In its first beginnings, the defence of Free Trade naturally took the form of correcting extravagant assertions, made with the object of showing that British trade was actually or relatively in decline; and Liberal speakers were everywhere occupied in presenting long files of reassuring statistics to anxious and inquiring crowds. In the upshot, a good many people have made up their minds, among other things, that British producers have no difficulty, in spite of hostile tariffs, in placing their exports; that British consumers and producers alike enjoy the advantage of a rich and varied home market, over which a moderate range of prices prevails; that fluctuations of enterprise and employment are less frequent and less violent than in the great Protected States; and that, after making all conceivable allowances for dissimilarity in conditions, the general standards of life and labour in the British Isles are improving and not inferior. But although the imminent danger, as it seemed, of a reversion to a Protective Tariff imposed this task, and although the facts established are true and salutary, the defensive rôle of moderator was not congenial to a democratic and Radical Party, and cannot but be out of harmony with its essential character. This discordance, inevitable though it was, transient as it has been, was in itself sufficient to carry Socialism from the regions of obscure philosophy to a permanent place in actual politics.

In proportion as the peril of reaction into a capitalist tariff became more remote, the progressive forces were able again to resume their forward march. The strange perversion of Tory politics still continues, and the influence of wealth is daily exerted to prove—and with great success—how uneven is its distribution. But Radicalism is back again in the collar. The forces grouped around the present Administration, and upon which it depends, are now strong enough, if boldly commanded, not only to ward off the dangers of Protection, but at the same time to urge forward the social march. And no one who serves the cause of progress need regret the assistance which its traditional opponents, from whatever motives, are now giving it. Unexpected and unnatural as the pressure of Tory-voiced discontent may be, it is susceptible of a useful and effective application to the purposes of social reconstruction. The blow which was aimed to throw, and nearly threw, the democratic engine off the line, has in glancing become itself a contributory impulse, and never before was the available driving power so great, and the available resisting power so inert. Now, if ever, is the time.

While these curious changes have been occupying the attention of the party world, a not less important modification has been consummated in the internal conception of the Liberal Party. It has not abandoned in any respect its historic championship of Liberty, in all its forms under every sky; but it has become acutely conscious of the fact that political freedom, however precious, is utterly incomplete without a measure at least of social and economic independence. This realisation is not confined to our islands. It is taking hold of men's minds as it never has before, in every popularly governed State. All over the world the lines of cleavage are ceasing to be purely political, and are becoming social and economic. The present majority in the House of Commons is pervaded by a social spirit, which is all the more lively and earnest because it has yet to find clear-cut and logical formularies of articulate expression. A great body of opinion is slowly moving forward, conscious of possessing in its midst a vital truth, conscious, too, of the almost superhuman difficulty of affording to it any definition at once sufficiently comprehensive and precise. It is for this reason that no hard and fast line can be drawn between the varied elements which constitute the strength of the present Government upon any ground of political theory. No true classification can be made in the abstract between Liberals and Radicals, or between Radicals and Labour representatives. It is only when confronted with some concrete fact that clear decisions can be taken. And hitherto most of the issues that have arisen have only served to demonstrate the general solidarity.

It is in such a situation, party and national, that the movement towards a Minimum Standard may well take conscious form. It is a mood rather than a policy; but it is a mood which makes it easy to perceive the correlation of many various sets of ideas, and to refer all sorts of isolated acts of legislation to one central and common test. Two clear lines of advance open before us: corrective, by asserting the just precedence of public interests over private interests; and constructive, by supplying the patent inadequacy of existing social machinery. It is this latter work which has lately attracted an increasing measure of attention throughout the country.

Science, physical and political alike, revolts at the disorganisation which glares at us in so many aspects of modern life. We see the curse of unregulated casual employment steadily rotting the under side of the labour market. We see the riddles of unemployment and underemployment quite unsolved. There are mighty trades which openly assert the necessity of a labour surplus—"on hand" in the streets and round the dock gates—for the ordinary commercial convenience of their business. And they practise what they preach. There are political philosophers who complacently resign themselves to the doctrine of the residuum. There are other industries which prey upon the future. Swarms of youths, snatched from school at the period in life when training should be most careful and discipline most exacting, are flung into a precocious manhood, and squander their most precious years in erratic occupations, which not only afford no career for them in after life, but sap and demoralise that character without which no career can be discovered or pursued. Thousands of children grow up not nourished sufficiently to make them effective citizens, or even to derive benefit from the existing educational arrangements. Thousands of boys are exploited in depressing men's wages, and are discharged when they demand such wages for themselves. The military obligations of foreign nations take two or three years from the life of every man, and ought thereby to give the dwellers in this island a mastery in peaceful craftsmanship over the whole world. All this inestimable advantage runs thriftlessly to waste. The army system is itself to a very large extent a pauperising machine, nicely calculated to take the best years from the lives of its servants with the minimum obligation to the State.

It is false and base to say that these evils, and others like them, too many here to set forth, are inherent in the nature of things, that their remedy is beyond the wit of man, that experiment is foolhardy, that all is for the best in "Merrie England." No one will believe it any more. That incredulity is one of the most noteworthy features in the evolution of public opinion to-day. The nation, which is greater than either party, demands the application of drastic corrective and curative processes, and will crown with confidence and honour any party which has the strength and wisdom necessary for that noble crusade.

We are already in battle on more than one point in this large field. The Licensing Bill comes to grips not only with the excessive consumption of strong drink, but with the unwarranted assertions of private interest. The Trade Disputes Act is a charter to Trades Unionism, and to all the social insurance that Trades Unionism involves. The Land Acts, some passed, others on the anvil, open to the people a new sphere for enterprise and exertion, and tend to afford a healthy stability to the Commonwealth.

But the future offers larger hopes and sterner labours. We have to contemplate the serious undertaking by the State of the elimination of casual employment through the agency of Labour Exchanges, and the scientific treatment, in every conceivable classification, of any unabsorbed residuum that may exist. The House of Commons has unanimously approved the institution of Wages Boards in certain notoriously "sweated" industries," and this principle may be found capable of almost indefinite extension in those industries which employ parasitically underpaid labour. We have to seek, whether through the acquisition of the railways or canals, or by the development of certain national industries like Afforestation, the means of counterbalancing the natural fluctuations of world trade. We have by an altogether unprecedented expansion in technical colleges and continuation schools, to train our youth in the skill of the hand, as well as in arts and letters, and to give them a far greater degree of discipline in mind and body. We have to make that provision for the aged which compassion demands and policy approves.

It is certain that as we enter upon these untrodden fields of British politics we shall need the aid of every moral and religious force which is alive in England to-day. Sacrifices will be required from every class in the population; the rich must contribute in money and the poor in service, if their children are to tread a gentler path towards a fairer goal. A fiscal system which prudently but increasingly imposes the necessary burdens of the State upon unearned wealth will not only be found capable of providing the funds which will be needed, but will also stimulate enterprise and production. And thus from many quarters we may work towards the establishment of that Minimum Standard below which competition cannot be allowed, but above which it may continue healthy and free, to vivify and fertilise the world.

It is because the influence of THE NATION may be powerful to aid and further these causes, that I send you my good wishes and congratulations to-day.—I am, Sir,

Yours faithfully,

WINSTON S. CHURCHILL.

THE JOINING OF THE BATTLE.

THE hubbub raised by the introduction of the Licensing Bill was not unexpected, and it would be foolish to imagine that it will evaporate in smoke and vapour. A struggle for the control by the State of the greatest trust monopoly which this country has ever seen is a struggle for life or death. There may have been much in the contention of the faint-hearted that this was a weight too heavy even for the present Progressive majority in England, or that other social subjects demanded a primary attention, or that the present and immediate guardianship of Free Trade necessitated the abandonment of such high enterprises as these, until the menace of Protection was altogether overpast. All these were considerations of caution, to delay the joining of the battle. But once the battle is joined, such caution becomes an ally of the enemy. It is impossible to fight in half-hearted fashion, or to withdraw after a few inglorious skirmishes. He is already throwing all his forces—horse, foot, artillery—into the combat. It is a fight to a finish. From to-day it is recognised that either the progressive parties will reassert the control by the people of the drink monopoly, or the drink monopoly will smash the progressive parties. Every by-election will be fiercely fought for the next few months, in the main, on this question; and many will be lost. We have never under-estimated the power of the public-house in political affairs. We are warned by our opponents of the dolorous record of past Temperance Bills, and of those Governments which have taken up, perhaps too light-heartedly, various temperance policies. That history was familiar to the promoters of the present measure. No solitary Liberal Member of Parliament, or party organiser, imagines in his wildest dreams that temperance legislation is a political asset in the constituencies. Not one, if the sole consideration was the retaining of votes and the maintenance of power, but recognises that it would be better left alone. If to-day the choice has been determined, and the whole line moves forward to the encounter, it is because there is universal acceptance of the absolute necessity of the control; for the present, in the encouragement of temperance and the breaking of the enshackling bonds of a great monopoly; in the future, for the regaining of a freedom in which may be elaborated one of the greatest of all social reforms. This is only another way of saying that a great moral struggle confronts the nation, and that if the Government is to win, it must appeal to the whole body of the people with weight and with power, with arguments fully setting out the case for control and liberation, with reliance on all helpful social agents and forces, with determination to stir the conscience and awake the reason, to dramatise and popularise the issue.

For control and liberation are the keystones of the measure. Other temperance reforms in the past have too consistently approached the question from the side of the working-man, allowing those who do not desire the public-house to vote down those who do. And in consequence they have always laid themselves under the imputation—in the constituencies—of establishing class legislation: of helping the wealthy and the middle classes “to rob the poor man of his beer.” This reform boldly attacks the drink monopoly as a whole. There is a big reduction scheme. There is a time-limit. All else, although crowded with regulations and adjustments long overdue, is subordinate to this large framework of reform. The details of the reduction scheme may be varied in response to legitimate criticism. The duration of the time-limit may be subjected to the “haggling of the market.” These are minor points of controversy. The fixed and guiding stars, in adjustment to which the Bill must finally emerge from the tumult, if the forces of progress are not to suffer an overwhelming defeat, are visible just in these two ultimate ideals. There is to be a great and progressive reduction in the number of to-day's excessively redundant licences, in the reduction of a competition which stimulates drinking far in excess of its social and benevolent utility. There is to be a definite moment when the complete control of a monopoly which the State has always in theory asserted, but which in practice has been allowed gradually to slip out of its hands, will once more be restored to it in unfettered freedom.

The Licensing Bill thus legislates, in the main, for the next generation; and legislation for the future is never so attractive as legislation for the present. “What has posterity done for us,” it has been asked, “that we should do so much for posterity?” Yet it is only by such gradual preparation for future successes that progress can steadily advance. The present is strewn with complexities and injustices which were established just in that lack of foresight by a people caring only for the day, and indifferent to the morrow. So that now we struggle for betterment of cities which ought never to have been built, debts which should never have been accumulated, burdens laid by the dead hand upon the living. If a generation ago this “time-limit” had been established in law, we might at the present be re-establishing the liberty which will be the inheritance of our successors. We do not desire the binding of these successors by resolutions passed in the present Bill. These resolutions cannot consist of more than a pious opinion; for what Parliament can establish, Parliament can undo. We cannot foresee how and in what direction public opinion will have matured in the fourteen years' interval. It may then be determined upon complete Prohibition (although the hypothesis is a little fantastic); or upon some form of local veto; or on disinterested management; or on municipal public-houses; or on a high-licence system; or even (though once again the hypothesis is fantastic) upon that free sale of liquor which Mr. Gladstone once thought would solve the whole question. Which, if any of these systems, or whatever combinations of these systems, may be possible at the end of the period of waiting, will be decided by the ripening of public opinion in the intervening time. And that process of education may find a new stimulus and inspiration in the knowledge that freedom, if delayed, is, in the end, assured.

Outside and beyond this vital issue, the new Licensing Bill, with its lengthy parts, schedules, and clauses, contains much of very great advantage to social reform. There is obviously, in some of its provisions, scope for bargaining. A Liberal Government, in face of the House of Lords, is always under the dismal necessity of modifying its legislation, with the knowledge of impending mischief; in apprehension of an unfriendly partner which, if he is given a coat, will demand a cloak also, and if offered company for a mile, will insist on twain. One of the outstanding features of the Bill is the enormously increased power given to the local licensing justices, who can practically impose almost any conditions to accompany the renewal of licences. Some of these obligations might well be embodied in a universal statute; notably those permitting the exclusion of children from drinking bars, and those which allow the closing of public-houses upon election days. The Bill is a challenge and an appeal. It is a challenge, elaborated not without courage, to a monopoly interest so secure in its dominance over the electoral machinery of popular government as to have treated all warnings and Commissions and programmes and organisations embodying this policy with utter contempt and indifference. It is an appeal, not only to all the reforming elements of the nation, social, humanitarian, religious; but also to a vast body of moderate opinion which has no special interest in the liquor question or the ravages of intemperance, but which does stand for the control by the people of any monopoly (whatever its nature) which has become the master, instead of being the servant, of the State. The struggle, if fierce and desperate, is at least inspiring, for it moves through the region of large issues; and towards no uncertain goal.

POLICY AND ARMAMENTS.

THERE are reasons, apart from specific declarations of policy by the Government, why the friends of peace may feel a sensible satisfaction with the debate on the Army and Navy Estimates. In the first place, the prevailing sense of the Liberal Party in Parliament was unmistakably with the Macdonald motion. Mr. Asquith must have realised this when he found that even his very moderate and dexterously balanced speech in defence of the Estimates fell coldly on the ears of his friends. In the second place, the issue was made fairly clear. Obscured by questions of detail, the conflict between the militarist and the non-militarist attitude did appear, and was powerfully sustained by speakers like Mr. J. M. Robertson, Mr. Simon, and Sir John Brunner on the one side, and Mr. Balfour on the other. What is the point of conflict? Mr. Balfour, the most finished Degenerate in our politics, set it in the sharpest outline when he denied that there was any vital "interdependence" between "armaments and policy," and declared that "fleets and armies were the only expedient known in this world by which those who desire to maintain their independence can maintain it in spite of the fluctuating movements of human passion." We doubt whether even statesmen of Mr. Balfour's materialist school will accept the theory, which does injustice to his own foreign policy quite as much as to that of his successor, that national existence can "only" be maintained by fleets and armies. It is obviously sustained by other than purely material forces—by international commerce, by mutual interests, by common good-will, such as asserts the independence of small States like Holland and Switzerland. These ties, again, are continually being weakened or strengthened by moral considerations, which clearly react on armaments. On what, after all, does the strength of the fleet depend? On theories as to the good-will or the ill-will of various Powers and groups of powers. A few short years ago we were building ships against France and Russia combined. To-day not even the Navy League really thinks it necessary to build against France. The United States was put out of the field of action by another pacific movement of the popular mind, both here and in America. Finally, the Anglo-Russian controversy has lost its sting, and its special point of peril on the Indian frontier. As the result of these and other political changes in our foreign relationships, the whole distribution of the fleet, in European, in American, and in Far Eastern waters, has been changed. We do, indeed, maintain the two-Power standard. But even that mechanical formula, which will hardly survive the battering it received in the debate, and the Government's refusal to make it the point of division, has been rationalised and reduced, both by Sir Edward Grey and by Mr. Asquith, so as to mean that we must maintain a fleet able to meet any "probable combination" against us. Or take another illustration of the way in which policy directly influences armaments. Either, as Mr. J. M. Robertson put it, an enemy's fleet can seriously damage our seafaring commerce, or it can but slightly affect it. If the latter theory be true, we are maintaining a vast fleet of swift armed cruisers to small purpose. If the former, we can restore safety to our mercantile, marine, and so cut down the cost of the fleet by millions, by consenting to abolish the right of capture. The truth is that policy and armaments react at every point. Three-parts of the new anti-German direction of the British Navy is an effect of suggestion, accompanied by persistent newspaper sensationalism. Are we told that statesmen are helpless against such influences? The action of statesmen overthrew or sterilised such forces in the case of France; it conquered them under Mr. Balfour's unimaginative but not aggressive rule, when the Russian fleet fired on our fishing-boats; and it is beginning to mitigate the vehement distrust of Germany, which is responsible for Rosyth, and for the race in "Dreadnoughts."

We see, indeed, how unreal is the present naval and military position when we are met by Mr. Asquith's admission that Germany's naval extension was natural to a nation "more and more dependent for food and raw materials upon oversea supplies, and with an extending maritime commerce which they were bound to protect." "Bound to protect" against whom? Our Navy is merely "defensive," says the Chancellor of the Exchequer. So are all the Navies. So are all the Armies. So say all the statesmen of all the countries. Whence then, with a more or less settled Europe, divided among powerful centralised Powers unable greatly to add to their material possessions, comes the need for these enormous armaments? Why, in particular, do we want many millions more for armaments than we wanted in 1899, when a wave of hatred of England, due to moral more than material reasons, swept over Europe? Largely because the new prepossession about the wickedness of Germany has followed on the heels of the old prepossession about the malice of America, and the still older obsession about France. This, in turn, crystallises on both sides of the North Sea in so many more battleships, cruisers, naval stations, docks, and guns, so that, as Captain Mahan said, in the search for ever greater power and speed in battleships, we open up "an unending programme, which causes unending increase of expense." As against the real insanity of such a process, it is not mere "economies" of administration that are sought by the friends of peace. They desire to stimulate the obstinate rationality of the more serious and instructed classes among the peoples against the statesmen who maintain and perpetuate the race of armaments, and even, like Mr. Balfour, have the effrontery to deny the possibility of staying it.

As for the Naval Estimates, we all know that the real controversy is postponed till next year, and that, in spite of the blinding language of officials like Mr. Edmund Robertson—who contrived in a single sentence to mis-state the position of this journal, and to misrep-sent his own estimates—we lay down only two monster vessels this year, because our experts have in mind the laying down of four or five "Dreadnoughts" and "Invincibles" in 1909, and an equal or even greater number in succeeding years. On this point the Government will succeed with their followers and with the country precisely as they reduce these claims and maintain the true and vital connection between "policy" and "armaments." There is no question of national safety. Mr. Archibald Hurd, a consistent advocate of a powerful Navy, states in the current "Nineteenth Century" what will be our relative naval position at the end of 1911, as against an impossible and absurd combination of France and Germany. In modern battleships we shall have a superiority of 17 per cent. in tons displacement, of 2'12 per cent. in the number of vessels; in modern armoured cruisers we shall have a superiority of 48'7 per cent. in tons displacement, of 22'5 per cent. in the number of ships; in officers and men, a superiority of 23'8 per cent. Thus, even if we are to defy reason in order to retain so obsolete a measurement as the two-Power standard, we need not affront arithmetic and pretend that we are in danger of falling below it. We do not take fanatical grounds; a powerful fleet is indispensable to us, and some regard must, no doubt, be had to Continental programmes, which happily encounter their own enemies at home. But we have to follow the historical lines of British defensive policy, which, when they were moderate, produced moderation in others, and since they have become extravagant, are, by force of imitation, upsetting half the Budgets of Europe.

THE OBSTACLE TO WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

THE poverty of the abstract arguments against Woman's Suffrage has been strikingly illustrated by the discussions on Mr. Stanger's Bill. Apart from the tactics of the Suffragettes, there is absolutely nothing new to be heard from opponents, and really, if the obstreperousness of a handful of women is no reason for hurrying on the change, still less is it an adequate ground for denying votes to an entire sex. Man does not strengthen his claim to be regarded as the more logical sex when he makes use of the fact that one or two women have chained themselves to the railings in Downing Street as an argument that admission to public affairs must demoralise womanhood. The truth is that, whether on the question of method or of principle, the claim of women to the vote is met on precisely the same ground as the claim of any unenfranchised class of men. Do they confine themselves to quiet argument and reasonable discussion? They are told that it is an academic issue, which may be decided when other matters are out of the way. Do they begin to demonstrate in the streets? They are told that they are a disorderly crew, to whom nothing can be conceded until quiet is restored. Those who remember 1867 and 1884 will recollect very similar arguments against the enfranchisement of the working-class. Either they broke the Hyde Park railings, which proved that they were a mob of Anarchists, whose admission to political power would mean red ruin and the breaking up of laws; or they did not break any railings, which proved that they cared nothing about the vote. Similarly it was shown in the old days that working-men knew nothing about politics; that their natural sphere was the workshop; that they were open to corruption; all of which went to show that the extension of the franchise would be of little political effect. At the same time, it was contended that they were numerically the majority, and that to enfranchise them was to hand over the government of the country to a single class.

All these arguments come out of the daily mill of controversy, as by a mechanical fatality, in relation to the suffrage for women. Women, we are told, know nothing about politics; their natural sphere is the wash-tub, or possibly, by a complimentary variation, the pedestal; they will be corrupt and open to intimidation—all of which shows that politically they will be an almost negligible power. At the same time, statistics are quoted illustrating what the census impolitely terms "the excess of females." Women are a majority; they are pictured as banding together to impose an iron rule on men, and we are gravely threatened with civil war as the result looming behind Mr. Stanger's Bill. The unprejudiced critic will, we think, leave these arguments to neutralise one another. There is 5 per cent. of truth in most of them, just as there was 5 per cent. of truth in most of the arguments against the extension of the masculine suffrage; just as there is 5 per cent. of truth in every argument of the kind against the extension of rights to an unfree class of a subject race. But in essentials all these arguments are arguments against the whole democratic idea, and if this idea, with all its defects, and after all its disappointments, has played a great and beneficent part in modern history, we shall want something more solid to resist its logical extension. In particular it is of the essence of this idea that the State is not based, as Mr. Cathcart Wason airily maintained, on force, but rather that force is based on the State, as itself the embodiment of ethical conceptions. The State uses force; but the essence of a Liberal or democratic constitution is to provide that such force shall only be set in motion by the general consent, obtained after full and free discussion. Why the judgment of women should not be called into play in such discussion is not apparent. To urge that they do not risk their lives in battle for their country, as a very few men do, is perhaps as relevant as to contend that men do not risk their lives in bringing children into the world, as the majority of women do—and that with a calmness in the long anticipation of which masculine courage is rarely capable. To urge that women differ from men is as true as it was to argue that the working-class differed from the educated. But that this difference is one that so gravely affects their power of judging their own interests as to render those interests safer in the keeping of others, is a contention which was rightly dismissed by Liberals in the one case, and will be dismissed by them in the other.

We hold, then, that the suffrage is a logical consequence of recognised Liberal principles, and is bound to come in time if Liberalism survives. If we have gone once again over the old ground of the broad argument on the question, it is because many Liberals have been naturally, but we think unduly, influenced by the extravagances of the "Suffragettes." But while the justice and the logic of the women's cause are irrefutable, we have to recognise that theirs is only one among a number of causes equally just, and in some cases more pressing. The function of this Parliament is to prove that organic social reform is compatible with Free Trade and Liberal principles. It has to deal with problems of education, temperance, unemployment, and poverty, which have piled themselves up through twenty years of reaction. These were the questions before the electors in 1906, and they are questions which every year's delay makes more difficult, while every year that sees them unsettled means so much more of misery unrelieved by hope for great masses of the people. The question of the suffrage, on the other hand, was not brought with any prominence before the electorate. It could not be dealt with unless it had had a foremost place among the subjects under discussion at a General Election, and there is no reason for giving it the preference which its advocates demand over the reform of the male electoral basis. The present electoral laws disfranchise large numbers of men, and give plural votes to a minority. No single one of the general reasons which we accept in favour of women's franchise goes to show that their enfranchisement must precede the rectification of these laws. The two kinds of injustice stand on the same footing, and the order in which they are redressed is a matter of convenience. It is perfectly natural that militant Suffragists should take a different view. Their concern, like that of every political section in contemporary politics, is to press for their particular reform, regardless of a broad consideration of the interests of the democratic cause. But those of them who hold out hopes that the suffrage will bring speedy alleviation to women-workers are, we fear, destined to a tragic disappointment. They might learn a lesson from the littleness of the results which twenty-three years of the suffrage have brought to the agricultural labourer. The effects of the suffrage will, we believe, be good in the end, as is the way with things that are just in themselves. But they will be very slow and largely indirect. The most important probably will be no special measure for the relief of any class of women operatives, but rather the indirect and gradual action on the general status of women, an action which will take a generation to complete itself, but for the beginning of which we cannot claim "urgency."

Life and Letters.

THE CAREFUL MAN.

HE came on one side of farmer stock who had married farmer stock since the invasion of the Saxons, and on the other side of county families who had married county families since the Norman conquest. He was born where the Town ended and country life began, educated at a Public School, and his father was a Judge.

Being designed for a profession he had adopted it, keeping himself in hand, so as not to be unpleasantly professional. For, since the time when he was wheeled in perambulators, he had never wanted to do anything too much. He had so completely seen the other side of being wheeled in perambulators that he had ever afterwards been loth to put himself in a position which made it needful for him to act with all his heart. His organs were, in fact, remarkably adjusted. He had not too much head, nor too much heart. He had not too much appetite, but he had appetite enough. When asked at lunch of which sweet he would partake, he would answer: "A little of both, thanks"; for nothing seemed to him in life so great a pity as to take one thing to the exclusion of another. This was why, after he had been Conservative from the age of one to thirty, something told him to become a Liberal; and when he had been a Liberal for ten years, to consider about going back again.

His attitude to women was a guarded one. It was repugnant to him to have too much wife, and yet not wife enough was also very painful; and so he had devised a way out of his embarrassment by saying to himself: "We two are only married to the extent that we desire to be; we will do exactly as we like." And he found that by thinking this, and getting his wife, who was a clever woman, to say she thought it too, he remained extremely faithful. With regard to children, it had no doubt been difficult, for—after a year or two—to have children and not to have them had been found impossible. In this dilemma he had considered very seriously what course he should adopt, and having carefully weighed the pros and cons had discovered them to be so very equal that he could come to no conclusion. In consequence of this he had two children; after which he found no difficulty in not wanting to have more.

The question of his residence had occasioned him some pain; for, supposing that he lived in Town he missed the country, and supposing that he resided in the country he missed the Town. He therefore lived a little in both Town and country; so regulating things that when in London he wanted to be out, and when out of London he wanted to be in; which kept him healthy.

A moderate meat diet gave him a hankering after other diets, making him a vegetarian in theory, so that he was in accord with either school. He drank wine at times, at times he drank no wine; he smoked a cigarette after each meal—no more, because it made him sick.

His feeling about money was that he ought to have enough, in order to have no feeling about money; and, to attain this vacuum, he mechanically restrained his wants, still more his wife's—for, not being so beautifully adjusted as himself, when she wanted things, she wanted them.

In matters of religion he would not commit himself to any definite opinions. If asked whether he thought there were a future life, he would say: "I see no reason to believe there is; on the other hand, I see no object in believing that there isn't; there may be, or there may not be; or, again, there may be a future life for some, no future life for others—a little of both, perhaps." Dogma of any sort, of course, he found offensive—you were committed by it, and to be committed was both repulsive and absurd.

Once or twice only in his life had he seriously felt careless, and these were on occasions when he found his carefulness was threatened by some person or event that tried to tie him down.

There was in him a sort of terror of being bound to anything; and when he was returned to Parliament, which happened after he was forty, he felt a natural uneasiness. Was he committed; if so, what was he committed to? Could he still get down on either side; and suppose he did get down, could he at once get up again? And he was happy when he found he could.

It was remarkable how national he was.

Yet he was not entirely conscious of his importance to the State, not recognising perhaps sufficiently how many other men were like him in every walk of life—not recognising that he was, in truth, the solid centre of the nation's pudding.

There was a word that he had early learned to spell; it started with a C, the second letter was an O, the third an M, the fourth a P, the fifth an R, the sixth an O, the seventh an M, the eighth an I, the ninth an S, the last an E. Once learnt, soon after he escaped from perambulators, that word was never more forgot. He took it to his office, he took it to his Church, he took it into bed with him at nights. And now that he had become a public man he took it to the House. But, having a regard, a veneration, for the figure of John Bull—that Myth who never modified his views, but held on fast to his ideals in spite of all the dogs of war—he preferred, whenever he was forced to act, to say that he had acted on his principles—and so, in truth, he had, for the deepest of his principles was the intimate belief that there was no such thing as principle.

This it was that gave him his pre-eminence in politics, for, seated in the very centre of the Seesaw, being the first to feel and answer to, he was the least affected by, its motion. By shifting just a little, and instinctively, he kept the whole machine together, having all the time a quiet contempt for the two ends that would keep swinging to the skies or bumping smartly on the ground. Nothing could be done without him in that House, because he was so plentiful; and very little with him.

He had a sense of humour, and devoted it to seeing all the fun there was in "cranks," and in extravagance of every kind. Never was he more amused than when he saw a person really give himself to anything; he would sit, sometimes with his hat on and sometimes with it off, watching with a quiet smile to see the beggar bump; and the bigger the bump was, the funnier he found it! For such as smiled at careful men he had a feeling that you could not take them seriously; it was their little joke, and not a very good one; and especially he wondered how people could be found foolish enough to place these persons in an Institution where care was of the essence of the atmosphere. Confident, however, that their want of care would soon undo them, he did not trouble much.

Phrases such as: "There is no middle policy," sometimes carried him away for quite five minutes; but he invariably came back in time to find there was. It had, in fact, long been a fixed and firm belief with him that he could make omelettes without breaking eggs, and though he clearly made no omelettes, on the other hand he broke no eggs. Nor did he ever fracture his belief that he was just about to make an omelette. And after all an omelette, even if you made it, what did it amount to? There it was! You ate it, and had to make another! Better far to fix an omelette in your mind, and keep it there unmade. But discussion on the omelette's composition he was always ready to encourage; and, sitting with his eye cocked at the ingredients, he would talk them over very carefully, and now and then break off a sprig of parsley, so that the omelette really did advance—but not too fast. Sometimes he was even known to contemplate the omelette all the night, but this he only did because he was so very much afraid that if he left it somebody would cook the thing; and he would go home in the early morning to his wife, complaining rather bitterly that with a little care all this excessive cooking in the House might be avoided.

Take him for all in all, he was not original in mind, and yet he was no flunkey, serving mortal masters—he served a nobler one than they—the great god Opportunity. But it was not safe to tell him this, for though there was no reason in the world why he should dislike its being known that he acted in accordance with his nature, somehow he did not like it. This was, no doubt, an instance of his care.

Hardly any social measure could be brought to his attention with which he did not feel a certain meed of sympathy. If, for instance, somebody proposed that the Army should be levied by conscription he would give a careful nod, and wait, because he knew that, as soon as someone else proposed that the Army should be entirely voluntary, this would also meet with his approval; or, again, if it were suggested that children should be made less hungry out of the public rates, he approved, but not too much, because he felt that to approve too much would interfere with his approval of the plan that they should not be fed out of the public rates. "A little bit of both," would be his thought, and by this masterly decision, which was often called his common sense, he infallibly secured possession to the children of a little bit of neither; but, as he very justly said, to grant the first was too progressive; to grant the second, retrograde. And so with every other measure.

His leaders on both sides had learned from long experience the daintiness of his digestion; how very sensitive it was to motion, how, if jolted, it revolted; and so they did not try too hard to jolt it now, for they naturally hated to be cast into the air. They appreciated, too, his sterling worth—without him they felt the country would improve too fast.

And they would look at him. With his eyelids just a trifle lowered, but his eyes a little anxious, with his lips pinched in, and yet half-smiling, in an overcoat of medium weight, put on or taken off according to the weather, he sat, not very often opening his mouth. Behind his grey and unobtrusive figure they saw the masses of grey, unobtrusive, careful men, and a little shiver would run down their spines.

Too often had they awakened from their dreams and seen him sitting there, under a tall grey tower with a clock that faced all ways, bench upon bench, row after row, by day, by night, one eye of him on one side, and one eye on the other, and his nose between them in the middle.

JOHN GALSWORTHY.

"THE SEASON."

ONCE again the effort is beginning which never has an end. It has been the theme of continuous, caustic criticism from the novelist, the satirist, the cynic. It has never been rationally defended, and those who are the most impetuous in its service are the first, in an occasional cool hour, to protest the futility of it all. Of all the variations of man's astonishing activities that the sun looks down upon, this thing surely must excite to "any observer somewhere in the region of the fixed stars" the most unforced and inextinguishable laughter. Its protagonists have expended some half of the year in tranquillity and quiet places—in rural England, in high

Swiss mountain valleys—anywhere in which the too exasperated material of the human mind can be nursed back into some semblance of sanity. They gather, from the four winds, into the tumult of the capital, to occupy the remaining half of the year in deliberate tearing the fabric of that mind to pieces in an orgie of human intercourse. It is effort directed at the highest pressure, with no interspaces of silence in which to learn, to suffer, or to enjoy. It is the effort of those few who are dominantly successful in a race where the majority are content with existence and endurance, to exhibit the magnitude of that success in a transitory experience of too violently accelerated life. For these months nobody is ever alone; nobody ever pauses to think; no one ever attempts to understand. All quick and novel sensations are pressed into the service of an ever more insistent demand for new things. Parliament pays its tribute, in a labyrinth of dining-rooms and a famous terrace, which is an annexe—as the Empire is an annexe—to the activities of this restless vitality. What passes for British Art in a Royal Academy and other less depressing exhibitions of decay; the Opera, dragging European singers to stimulate an audience numbed by the whirl of circumstance; any unexpected appeal, a decadent French play, actors from an earlier, simpler, passionate South, an audacious novel or two, a passing scandal, serve to stimulate and infuse the concoction with some lambent vitality. But, for the most part, it is talk—talk—talk—talk at luncheon and tea and dinner; talk at huge, undignified crowded receptions, where each tiny talk is disturbed by the consciousness of each that his neighbour is desirous of talk to others; talk at dances and at gatherings, far into the night; with the morning devoted to preparations for further gatherings for talk in the days to come. It is talk usually vapid, sometimes clever, occasionally sincere; of a society desirous of being interested, more often find-itself bored, filled with a resolute conviction that it must play the game; that this is the game to be played, that it must be played resolutely to the end. Elemental real things occasionally intrude: marriages, and those unexpected deaths which refuse to postpone themselves to a more convenient out-of-season. What does it all mean? No one knows. What does it all come to? Again, no one knows. To many it stands for the inevitable, as the factory life is inevitable to some, the field drudgery to others. Many it excites and stimulates with a consciousness of power in human intercourse and the subtle sensation of rejoicing in a crowd. To the few alone it presents the appearance of a complicated machine, which has escaped the dominating control of all human volition, and is progressing furiously towards no intelligible goal; of some black windmill, with gigantic, revolving wings, rotating untended under the huge spaces of night.

It is not illuminated by high ardours. It is not disfigured by great crimes. The accepted criticism of its "smartness," its vulgarity, its selfishness, is based upon a biased reading of values. There are those who are pushing to get in as there are those who are pushing to get out; there are egotisms here as in all human energies; revolts which drive their victims outside the accepted standards; reactions which find expression in a petulance or a despair. But neither to-day nor to-morrow will this strange and bewildered turmoil stand for anything conformable to the record of various pleasure-loving societies, which from time to time have lived and flourished and died. But if its viciousness be but the palest reflection of its previous parallels, its activities and devotions are similarly set in grey. It has none of the delirium of passionate pleasures which accompanied the decline and fall of Rome; but it has little of the large utterance, and magnificence of artistic display, the consciousness of occupying a great arena in the world's affairs which speaks from every day's record of that long autumn of decay. It has few of those feverish and almost unintelligible lusts and cruelties which make the story of the Early Renaissance in Italy like the memory of evil dreams. But, on the other hand, it will neither stamp upon the stone and marble of its dwelling-places, nor store up upon the walls of its cities and opulent houses, nor write in the unforgettable life-history of its men and women that harvest of an artistic glory and a new, rich individual experience which makes that Renaissance appear as one of the wonder-ages of the world. To-day, here, in London, it plays and trifles with large forces which, if it once understood them, it would flee from in terror and dismay. Its social and philanthropic enterprises are fairly ample; it bestows considerable sums on public and private charities, shepherding its friends into drawing-room meetings to listen to some attractive speaker—an actor, a Labour Member, a professional humorist—pleading for pity to the poor. It discusses the possibility of social upheavals in that dim, silent, encompassing life in which all its activities are embedded—the incalculable, mechanical populations which set the society that matters in the midst of a rude and multitudinous society that does not count. It plays in good humour with light schemes of Social Reform; wondering, like the pleasant salons of Paris in the new age of gold before the Revolution, whither events are tending; convinced, as these salons also were convinced that nothing can alter the effectual standards of its world. It plays with religion; listening to the agreeable discourses of one popular preacher, urging kindness and charity and toleration to all men; amused at the violence of another, denouncing all its works and ways; a little disturbed by a third, feeling the sudden intrusion of the cold hand of a universe in which all these standards are unknown. "Sydney Smith talking," wrote Carlyle in his diary, "other persons prating, jargonizing. To me, through these thin cobwebs, Death and Eternity sat glaring." Only in an occasional solitary hour, in that magic twilight of a London June evening, or in the early flare of a dim dawn over the sleeping city, do such disturbing visitants tear the silence with a sudden cry.

It is the aggregation of clever, agreeable, lovable people, whose material wants are satisfied by the labour of unknown workers in all the world, trying with a desperate seriousness to make something of a life spared the effort of wage-earning, and very fearful of being left alone. It is built up and maintained in an artificial, and probably a transitory, security, which has never been extended in the world's history for longer than a few generations. To-day it is commencing the conflict; in a few months' time it will retire, exhausted, having completed—not unsuccessfully, and in some cases with some honour—that queer enterprise of random activity which is called a London Season. So it will continue with each until each drops out, if uncomplaining a little fatigued, and the fresh recruits take the place of the deserters and the dead. Charles Lamb would "often weep in the Strand for fulness of joy at so much life." Tennyson confessed that in the heart of all this eager, impetuous crowd, demanding so pitifully the correct thing and the new thing, he was impressed always by the hazardous and transitory nature of it all. So soon would this vitality and exuberance be all suddenly extinguished in silence; all "Mane floreat, et transeat: vespere decidat. Et custodia in nocte"—"as a watch in the night."

SPRING IN INDIA.

BARODA, FEBRUARY 7th.

THE mango trees are all in bloom, and the air full of their smell. It has just the touch of turpentine in it that makes the mango fruit so nice, and is so refreshing in an English room that has been spring-cleaned with furniture polish. The mango bloom is the Indian "may"—the sign that spring has come indeed, and that is why all the great Sirdars, or landowners, of the State were gathered in the palace hall at nine o'clock this morning, and sat in thick rows of white-clad figures, with Mahratta turbans of red and gold on their heads, and curved swords glittering across their knees. The Maharajah had summoned them in darbar, to celebrate the festival of Vasantha, or the Spring, and on the inlaid pavement below their seats a nautch-girl from Madras danced without ceasing, to the inspiring noise of three or four pipes and a little drum. All the instruments sounded their peculiar notes together, but apparently with random independence, though the girl seemed to know what varied emotions they would express. For she danced forward with gestures that she felt to be suited to some imperceptible motive, her jewels flashing, and the heavy gold of her sash swinging over her knees. Then, having reached her limit of advance towards the empty throne, she walked quietly backwards, softly clapping her little brown hands to some imperceptible time.

Suddenly from the palace garden came the sound of the little old guns which the British Government allows Native Rulers to retain for saluting purposes, or to batter the mud walls of an occasional village, as evidence of their regal power. To the roar of this artillery the Maharajah entered, and, keeping step at his side, came the British Resident, conspicuous in civilisation's clothing. Behind them, stiff with scarlet and gold, stalked the British officers of a regiment quartered upon the State by the terms of an ancient treaty. Passing up the pavement between the rows of Sirdars, the Maharajah took his seat upon the purple velvet sofa, having the British Resident side by side upon his right, while the British officers settled into the topmost chairs, like a patch of poppies in a daisy field. All the time the pipes and drum never ceased, and the dancing-girl continued to advance and retire with various embellishments.

Attendants appeared, bearing garlands and silver sprinklers, and trim little bunches of flowers tightly tied up. The heaviest garland was selected for the British Resident, and he bent his comely head submissively to receive it on his neck. It was made of white jasmine, picked out with silver "fairy rain," such as beautifies our Christmas-trees. He was also presented with a tight bunch of flowers, and lavishly sprinkled with scent from the silver vessels. Similar but smaller garlands were then placed round the necks of the British officers; similar but smaller bunches were presented to them, and they were sprinkled with scent, but less lavishly, as became their inferior position in the representation of Britain's might. When the most junior subaltern had been sprinkled, the Maharajah and the Resident rose, and the British contingent marched out of the hall, the garlands flopping against their thighs, as when of old Greek bulls went adorned for sacrifice.

So the rulers departed, and again the feeble old guns did their utmost to voice the honours due to Imperial grandeur. Then the Maharajah returned to his sofa, and a sigh of relief appeared to pass through the hall. I thought I could even hear it from behind the carved shutters of the gallery, where ladies stood watching in seclusion, like the ladies behind the grill of our House. The attendants again bore garlands, bouquets, and sprinklers into the hall. The Maharajah was garlanded first, and then his son, the heir to the sofa, who received his honours with a superior smile that told of Oxford's contamination. The most peculiar part of the ceremony came next, when silver plates were brought in, heaped high with vermilion powder and with yellow, to represent the fertilising dust of flowers in spring, and this dust was thrown in handfuls over the Maharajah and his heir, and then over each Sirdar in turn.

Suddenly the white chests of all that loyal assembly blazed with patches of scarlet and gamboge, while pipes and drum pursued their own wild will, and the dancing-girl danced up seductively. Then the Maharajah rose, and the whole assembly followed him from the hall. The climax had been reached, and the ceremony of spring was over, except that for the rest of the day the street boys rejoiced in "all the fun of the fair," throwing red and yellow powder over the passers-by. And if they mixed a little oil with the powder, the passer-by will recall the flowers that bloom in the spring whenever he puts these clothes on again.

You would suppose that such a ceremony was but the childish consolation of some wretched prince, whom we allow to retain on sufferance the pomps and vanities of barbaric splendour, just as an idiot heir is allowed a rocking-horse and wooden sword by his trustees. And that is partly true. It is in the spirit of interested trustees for idiot children that the British Government gives the Maharajah that artillery to play with, and arms his handful of troops with ancient muzzle-loaders, that I had despaired of ever seeing in use. An ordinary and enfeebled ruler might thus solace himself with pretty shows for a life of miserable impotence, just as Napoleon's son played at soldiers in the Austrian palaces. Such is the end of most of those who are born to rule our Native States. Fantastic palaces in every street, marble courts where fountains play all the summer, bedizened elephants in lordly rows, bejewelled girls beyond the dreams of Solomon, studs of horses ceaselessly neighing, changes of golden clothes for every hour of the day and night, heaps of golden coins piled high in treasuries, drink deep as wells, exquisite foods selected from Paris to Siam—oh, but to be weak is miserable!

But the ruler of Baroda has the strength that conquers power out of weakness. Brought up among the temptations of princes, cheated with the mockeries of authority, distrusted as seditious for the very excellence of his reforms, he has raised his little State of some two million souls to become the most advanced and best administered district of India, with the possible exception of Mysore. I know the worst that can be said against him. His land-tax is rather above the average of British India, but at all events his entire income of just under £1,000,000 a year, is spent in the country itself, and does not go to cherish annuitants in Cheltenham or Whitehall. Like the English aristocracy, he is fond of building more houses than one man needs to live in. Like the late Lord Salisbury and Mr. Kruger, he displays an exaggerated solicitude in providing for members of his family, beyond the requirements of laudable thrift. And, worst fault of all, he has been sometimes suspected of imitating the Anglo-Indian authorities in favouring Europeans at the cost of fully qualified Indians. On one occasion also, I believe, he conducted a punitive expedition, on almost British lines, against some troublesome villagers. I know all this is said, and much of it is very likely true, for even in a hovel it is difficult to live above reproach. But I have also heard that in the foolish Durbar at Delhi, when other Native Rulers salaamed and prostrated themselves to earth, the Maharajah of Baroda went up to Lord Curzon like a man, and shook him heartily by the hand; and I think that story as likely to be true as the others.

It is now over twenty-five years since he entered upon his power, after a few years of tutelage under the British Government, which had deposed his predecessor for overstepping the latitude granted to Native Rulers in everything but politics. In that quarter-century, by the help of carefully chosen Ministers, such as Romesh Chandra Dutt, he has realised reforms in government and daily life that are continually called impossible by ourselves. Throughout his whole State he has absolutely separated the judicial from the executive functions—a reform that we have acknowledged for years to be essential for India, but are boggling over still. He has restored the ancient village Panchayat, or local government, by the men whom villagers can trust, whereas, in our passion for rigid and centralised power, we have almost destroyed the last vestige of this national training in self-government.

After a careful experiment for fourteen years in one district, he has now made primary education compulsory and universal throughout his State. Whereas in British India the Government expenditure upon primary education, I believe, still stands at about £200,000, or considerably less than £1 per thousand of the population, in Baroda the proportion is about £1 to every fifty-five, and the State counts more educated girls, for its size, than any other part of India. The latest step in constitutional reform has been the admission of genuinely elected members into the Legislative Council, which is to meet this year for the first time in its more democratic form. Such reforms as the Indian Government has hitherto proposed for its Legislative Councils, are only intended to frustrate what shadow of democratic principle exists in them now.

But it is much harder to change a social custom than to legislate, and the Maharajah's greatest triumphs lie in the prevention of child-marriages, the emancipation of ladies from the "purdah," or curtained life of India, and the breaking-down of caste barriers. In all this he has been aided by the encouragement and example of his Maharani, who has stood by his side like one of the heroic queens of Mahratta history. In all India I suppose there is not another man and woman who have done more for the happiness and advancement of their people, or done more to disprove the common Anglo-Indian charge that Indians are incapable of carrying out even their own reforms. For their very success they are suspected and maligned by officials, who have not the courage to imitate their methods. But when official torpor and private malignity have said their worst, the Maharajah and his queen remain among the royal souls of India. They have once more established the old Roman paradox that it is possible to follow virtue even in a palace, and there is something almost Aurelian in their proud service to the Commonwealth.

HENRY W. NEVINSON.

A SHAKER OF THINGS.*

THE creator of Zarathustra has one quality which, his philosophy apart, should recommend him even to the unphilosophical reader; he is a master of style. His German is that of Henry Suso and of Luther, picturesque, direct, incisive: a child could not mistake his meaning; a lapidary might envy the clear-cut precision of thought and phrase. And it loses little in translation.

"Say where is justice to be found, which is love with seeing eyes."

"Convictions are prisons."

"All unuttered truths become poisonous."

"Thoughts which come on doves' feet rule the world."

Or, again,

"All good things laugh."

"The way—existeth not."

"Valuing is creating."

"Only where there are graves are there resurrections."

The perfection of form is French, rather than German or English; La Rochefoucauld, with a flavour of Montaigne.

In a democratic age Nietzsche was no democrat; in a world of convention he ran full tilt against the most cherished principles and prejudices of his fellow men. Whether they really entertained these principles and prejudices is another matter: at any rate they thought they entertained them, and were not a little satisfied with themselves for doing so: he outraged at once their convictions and their self-esteem:—

"Sin—a Jewish invention."

"Salvation of the soul means, in plain words, the world revolves round me."

"The secret of a joyous life is to live dangerously."

"Not your sin, your moderation, crieth to heaven."

Well, this is not the morality of the copy-book; the annoyance of respectable persons can be explained. That there was an element of paradox in such sayings is obvious—what great teaching, from the Republic of Plato to the Sermon on the Mount, is without it? The reader "must beware of taking Nietzsche's materialism grossly, or his metaphysics abstractedly": he spoke in picture, and was further from the crowd in figure than in fact. But, though his outlook over life was not peculiar to himself—had it been so, it would have roused no echo in his generation—he said out what others would not say at all; and, if they thought, would not admit, even to themselves, that they thought it. His aim was to do for morals what Copernicus did for astronomy; to take a new centre and work from a new base. He went back, that is to say, to Nature. "Why undress in public?" asked the bystander. "Duty before decency," he would have answered. He did not admit that clothing was necessary—which it is in our climate; he classed it, too indiscriminately, under the head of sham. Everything, without exception, went into his melting-pot; this was what made him so offensive to the half-hearted who would spare Agag. Nietzsche, though the dethroned monarch came unto him delicately, hewed him in pieces before the Lord.

* "Nietzsche in Outline and Aphorism." By A. R. Orage. Edinburgh; Foulis. 2s. 6d.

In other than moral science, the revaluation of received judgments and rules of action is no novelty. Here it was at once new and startling: that Nietzsche attempted it, and still more that he did not disguise his attempt, is enough to account for the disfavour which attaches to his name. The husband and father reads: "Be not virtuous beyond your ability," which, after all, comes to much the same thing as the "Be not righteous over much" of Ecclesiastes, and fears for his daughters and his spoons. Nietzsche, however, is taken seriously in Germany; and, though handicapped by the advocacy of certain of his prophets in this country, will have to be taken seriously here. He did not love us: "The English," he said, "are a people of consummate cant." And the national sense of decorum, so disrespectfully referred to, is intolerant of nonconformity. In England more than elsewhere, the wise man remembers that his hearers are not wise, and mixes folly with his wisdom, which, like gold, cannot become current coin without a proportion of alloy. His antinomianism, however, was a retort rather than an attitude; a refutation of the average man's standpoint. "Popular morality," he puts it, "is comparable to popular medicine: there is no science in either"; "the moral world also is round." A static moral order, that is to say, assumes a complete knowledge of the laws of life. Medieval man believed himself to possess this knowledge: hence his fixed dogma, his deductive method, the abstractedness of his thinking. The premise, however, was at fault. We stand not at the core of things, but somewhere on their periphery. Our knowledge, therefore, is fragmentary and relative—to suppose it otherwise is to bow down to an Idol of the Tribe and the Theatre; and morality ceases to be stereotyped as soon as this is admitted. The casuistry of Jesuit theologians, which was always logical, and for which a better case than Pascal believed could often be made, was a reductio ad absurdum of the statutory conception of obligation—the Provinciales do not so much disprove Escobar's reasoning as undermine the vicious ethical basis on which it built. Morality is spirit, not letter; its unchangeableness is one of direction rather than of content: in Pauline language, we are not under the law but under grace. How much of the mind of to-day, at its sanest, is compressed into such maxims as:—

"Ye ought to say Enemy, but not Villain; Invalid, not Wretch; Fool, not Sinner."

"If moral judgments are the judgments of health, then criminals are diseased, and should be treated as such."

"Physiological confusions are the source of all evil." There is a slightness of texture, indeed, both in our virtues and our vices: "Let us confess: as your wisest men did not seem to me so very wise, so I found men's wickedness much less than the fame of it."

What discredited Nietzsche was his uncompromising realism. This stood for him as truthfulness. "Not wishing to see something which one sees, not wishing so to something as one sees it; that is what I called falsehood." The wish to believe is fatal to veracity. He saw or at least tried to see, things not as he wanted them to be, but as they were. Again, he was an artist; and his art enters into his philosophy: the autobiographical element which is inseparable from speculation—"every great philosophy is an involuntary memoir"—is exceptionally prominent; the reader must be, like the writer, an artist, or he will not understand. From Schopenhauer he learned to make Will the centre. Ideas and Things are constructions, therefore variable; that which constructs, the Master-Builder, remains. The reversal of this order, the attempt of philosophers, Idealist or Materialist, to find reality where there is none, he called Nihilism: action was all. This must not be misinterpreted. The relative value of ideals is unquestioned: but their function is regulative; they were made for men. Taken as ends-in-themselves, they become

"idols, before which men prostrate themselves in desire for the cessation of life. It is not in the nature of life to fulfil ideals, and the desire to have them fulfilled, or, rather, the conviction that they will one day be fulfilled, assumes the existence of a will that has lost its way and no longer desires life."

The Ideal, in other words, like the Law, is a school-master. No summit is final: behind the furthest lies a further still.

It is a mistake to look at Nietzsche as an anarchist. In the Discourse on the Three Metamorphoses, the Lion, the destroyer, stands side by side with the Camel, the bearer of burdens, and passes over into the "new beginning," the Child. His own type, indeed, was the destroyer; but the destruction which he desired to see brought about was a prelude and condition, not an end. "To create freedom for a new creation, and a holy disobedience, even in the presence of obligation, for this the Lion is required." Or, to go back to the aphorisms:—

"In order that a sanctuary may be erected, a sanctuary must be broken down."

"What is falling already, that shall be destroyed."

"With this counsel I counsel kings and Churches and all that are weak from old age and virtue: allow yourselves to be subverted, in order that ye may recover life, and that virtue may recover you."

Prophecy, not systematic doctrine—this is what, if we read him rightly, we shall look for in Zarathustra. Prophecy, poetry, parable—they are incommensurate with system; there is no standard common to the two. His are seminal thoughts; and of such come harvests. Or, to change the metaphor, the path may not always lie in the direction in which he sought it. But he was a Pioneer.

MARCH GREY-FACE.

It is a struggle to leave bed at seven, but we are fixed for a train and it must be done. When the fishing appointment was made, we were in St. Valentine's summer. We dreamed of a sunny day on the lake wherein the big pike lurk, and we thought more of the high blue dome and a ring of green-dotted trees than of the nominal object of the excursion. To-day the morning sun is here, but the history of yesterday and several yesterdays assures us that clouds will be our mid-day portion. Moreover, the world has an icing of new snow, hardened by the rigour that almost glued us to the bed.

We can at any rate change the venue from lake to river. In two hours, the almost unspecked blue of morning has become an unbroken cloud of grey. There is none of the light that the grass loves to play with, and field and marsh, and the bare-twigged trees, might almost have been painted from the same brush. It daunts not nor damps the pike-fisher. In fact, he rejoices while he fixes up his rod, at the amber muddiness of the water. There is just so much colour in the stream as he likes to see, not so much as to make his lure far to seek, just enough to blur the outline of the hooks. We never flatter ourselves that the hooks are invisible, only that they can be made so sketchy in appearance as to allow a hungry pike to persuade himself that they are a hallucination. The colour of the water being right, the descendant of Walton takes no notice of the grey sky and the grey land around him.

Slowly the firmament blackens in the eye of the north wind, as though the pigment had run there from the other parts of a wet water-colour, and, without warning to him whose eyes have been fixed on his float, a fierce snow-storm is hurled at him across the river. It makes no difference, or shall we say that, so far from worrying the fisherman, it makes him hope that this may be just the change in the weather that was needed to make the fish hungry? Other sportsmen enjoy the snow equally well. Far away, there is a rising howl that goes very well with the shriek of the wind, and in a few minutes we are aware that the hunt is coming in our direction. It comes almost as swiftly as the snow-storm. We are right in the track of the fox and his pursuers. He is on the other side of the river and wishes to cross, and we are fishing at the only bridge. There is a shaking of the laurel and Reynard jumps out, crosses the bridge till he is close on us, starts a little, and changes his stride, and whisking by on nimble legs, is soon a field in front of the hounds, who have checked among our recent footsteps on the other side of the river. They do not catch their fox. He lives to remember how he sprang from his sleeping-place on a hay-stack, right among the hounds, dodged their lumbering snaps at him, raced them till a lucky chance fouled the scent, and thereafter, laying a double, left them baffled.

Leaving our fellow fishers at the pool, we return to the upper river, determined to catch the big pike that lives there. The grey scene becomes our exclusive possession. The wind of the snow-storm has passed, and the tall alders bend their knotted tangle of twigs to a calm, amber-grey river. Beyond, on higher ground, wych elms draw their delicate hatching across the mellow red-brick front of an Elizabethan mansion. A herd of fallow deer, many of them white, stand in the park near the evergreen of a large holm-oak, and some hollies whose berries just declare themselves in the grey light of our afternoon. Coming quietly and alone to the pool where the pike lies, we only faintly startle a pair of hares gambolling on the bank. They go off with a peculiar trot, that makes us think for a moment they are small grey foxes. Then they sit and look back at us, and having thus assured us that we are their very good friends—at such a distance—resume their discussion.

Not till we have swung the bait with a splash nearly to the far side of the river, do two hen pheasants rise from the shorn sedges and fly away. We had been visible to them for some minutes, but though their cover was of the slightest, they might have been invisible to us if they had remained for an hour. A duck, too, that had been feeding in the marsh, goes off with whirling wings, and while we were far off a pair of herons sailed lumbering away. Must everything on land and in water flee at our approach? They will come back if we are quiet enough, the little things first, and then one by one the large things, till perhaps even the heron will stand in the shoal again, and make the gaudy king-fisher angry at his poaching. There is a swinging in the alder twigs overhead, and the red-and-white face of a gold-finch looks down. He is far from being alone. When he has searched rather perfunctorily one or two of the hard little cones, he flies to the ground, and then, one after the other, quite thirty of his fellows join him. Then something startles them, and up they come in one glorious body, irradiating the grey day like a burst of sunshine, emphatically the gold of heaven and not the gold of earth.

In the river, there is a tiny splash as a little fish jumps out, and a rapid swell stirs the surface, as the pike passes just below. But our bait has taken refuge, and the hook is fast. We do not succeed in freeing it till we have pulled up from the depths a water-lily rhizome more than a yard long, and as thick as a man's wrist. It is crowned with bright green, arrow-shaped leaves, and little round flower buds on their strong elastic stems. So, summer seems nearer under the water than in our grey world. "Here's provender for you, friend," we think as we throw down the tuber. The friend in question is a water vole, sitting on the stump of a felled elm across the stream. After the merest pretence at washing his face, he drops to his feet and glides across the stump as though on invisible wheels, flows down the steep edge, and comes into view again in a little patch of snowdrops. The white blossoms are in sharp contrast to his deep brown coat. One of them nods and falls: the rascal has gnawed it from its root. He has time for no repetition of the act, for with a rush through swaying blossoms, a second vole is upon him. There is a brief tussle, then flight, and a fresh vole is sitting on the stump, his rival swimming straight across to us. But the snowdrop-stealer's eyes are sharp, and a yard from the bank he dives with a loud splash that makes the stump vacant.

And now fishing hours are over. Western gates open in the dome of cloud, and the sun prepares to give a pale golden good-night. Water-hens are running far out in the field, and at times startling us with loud liquid crow, close at hand. A string of rooks passes over on the way to roost, and seven dots further off, flying in mathematical V, proclaims themselves wild duck. They are black against a pinkish yellow, which the river answers with a mellow gleam like that of half-opened hawthorn buds. And what of our fishing? It has even been a more complete blank than the fox-hunting, for we have not had a single run. Next week the big pike goes under the ægis of the Mundella Act. May he enjoy the coming summer, and keep appointment another day!

Letters from Abroad.

A SICILIAN SUPERMAN.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—“Nasi is a criminal,” “Nasi is a martyr,” are the opposite opinions expressed about the ex-Minister of King Victor Emmanuel, condemned by the High Court of the Italian Senate. As in all opinions dictated by passion, there is much exaggeration in both these estimates, and the punishment inflicted by the High Court on Nunzio Nasi reflects to a certain extent this contradiction. In fact, to condemn him to eleven months and twenty days of prison, of which seven months have to be taken away as he has already spent them in confinement, and to an interdiction of fifty months from public office, is too light a punishment admitting that he is guilty of the crimes attributed to him, and is too severe if stress is laid on the extenuating circumstances. From another point of view, the term of prison and the privation of civil rights included in the sentence are disproportionate, as the former is based on the minimum sentence which could be given, and the latter on the maximum. This gives credit to the belief that the judges, as politicians, consciously or unconsciously, obeyed the impulse to try to suppress, in Nunzio Nasi, a dangerous competitor for the Premiership. Therefore the sentence of the Italian Senate, instead of representing, as it was hoped, the end of a sinister period in the Parliamentary life of the young kingdom, may have further and graver consequences. In many parts there is clamour for the opening of inquiries in all the departments of the State, to prove that they are, or are not, conducted better than that of Public Instruction under Nasi. Senators and deputies are petitioning the King to pardon the condemned ex-Minister, so that he may immediately re-occupy his post as member of Parliament. It is certain that Nasi's constituency will re-elect him unanimously, notwithstanding his having been deprived of civil rights. His election, of course, will be annulled, but this will only have the effect of rendering his partisans more fervid. His successive elections will become more and more of a plebiscite. The short Italian Parliamentary history, counting only sixty years of existence, furnishes plenty of examples of the kind.

Independently of this, one of the strangest manifestations after the sentence condemning Signor Nasi was the petition from many members of Parliament to the King to pardon him. The right of pardon is, according to the Italian Constitution, one of the prerogatives of the Crown. But usage has established that it is only exercised when asked for by the accused through the regular channels, and supported by the Cabinet in the person of the Minister of Grace and Justice. The initiative, taken in this case by a considerable number of members of Parliament, the day after the sentence issued by the High Court, may therefore even be taken as a slight on the Senate, the members of which decided that Signor Nasi was guilty of peculation by 78 votes against 23, and agreed on the punishment to be inflicted upon him by 98 votes against three.

The ugliest feature of the whole case is that a large number of Sicilians, the fellow-islanders of Signor Nasi, believe in good faith that he was accused, tried, and condemned only for political revenge, and to get rid of a dangerous rival. They, in other words, think that the Deputy of Trapani was destined through his intelligence, culture, and political ability soon to become Premier of Italy, and that his enemies fabricated the case to destroy him and remove an obstacle to their ambitions. This situation re-awakened in the Sicilians all their always latent feeling of antagonism to and independence of the Continent. Their demonstrations, in fact, are marked by cries of "Down with the Italian Government," and headed by red flags as fore-runners of the future Sicilian Republic.

In fact, in the whole Nasi affair there has not been a touch of anti-Sicilian animosity. Nasi's first and strongest accuser was a Sicilian, Baron Saporito. Even this, from another point of view, was not favourable to a clear and equanimitous judgment of the case, as Nasi and Saporito, being the heads of two conflicting factions in their native island, were personal enemies. It is known that one of Baron Saporito's brothers was killed eight years ago, and that Signor Nasi and his friends were suspected of having instigated the murder.

The great body of Signor Nasi's supporters base their defence of him on the fact that he is no worse than former Ministers, and that if he were to be condemned, the others should also be punished. Otherwise he would be the scape-goat of a system to which the sentence of the High Court was not likely to put an end. Their contention was not entirely irrational. No one could say that Signor Nasi was dishonest in order to enrich himself or his family. He was the most typical representative of the Southern temperament in the Chamber. To brilliant intelligence and fascinating eloquence he joined indomitable ambition and unbounded audacity. The trial has shown only part of what in Italy many knew, that he, the first time as simple Minister of Posts and Telegraphs, was planning means for his country to exercise political influence in Tunis, and then, as Minister of Public Instruction, was organising scientific expeditions, which, in his mind, should have led to the occupation of Tripoli by Italy. This over-estimation of his power, which is a thoroughly Southern characteristic, manifested itself in all his acts as Minister, leading to a complete indifference to all control and administrative ties.

In such a frame of mind, he could not understand how a man once Minister should not be allowed to dispense favours right and left to his friends, and should maintain himself within the limits of the appropriation established by Parliament and spend it in the prescribed manner, when, as he said, he was convinced that in serving his own interests he was at the same time serving those of his country. From this misconception of his power, which one of the witnesses at the trial called "an imperialistic feeling," came all his misfortunes. While Minister, most of the subsidies, pecuniary encouragement, indemnities, &c., which he distributed went to the city of Trapani, his birth-place and constituency, and to persons often bound to him either by ties of blood or by ties of party. Where, however, his colossal vanity appeared most tangibly was in the printing and binding of 34,000 volumes containing his speeches, and in 67,900 visiting cards, all, of course, at the expense of the State. In the same way he could not understand why, if something was lacking to the adornment in his private apartment, it should not be supplied by the State. He even went so far as to have put down in the accounts of official expenses some entirely private expenditure by his son, and the cost of photographing his daughter. This recalls the manoeuvre of another politician, Minister of Agriculture, who had the pictures of several lady friends put down in the State accounts as "photographs of animals useful to agriculture."

The ex-Minister of Public Instruction, perhaps, was not personally responsible for all that was done in his name. But there is no doubt that he, more than any other member of the Cabinet since the institution of Parliamentary government in Italy, personified the most complete disregard of all rules of good administration and of obedience to the dictates of Parliament. More than his arguments, more than his eloquent orations, his best defence was the insignificant value of some of the objects which he appropriated or misdirected from their proper uses. He insisted on being judged not by the ordinary courts but by the Senate in High Court of Justice, and he fled from Italy to avoid what he, like all his Southern fellows, dread more than anything else, the imprisonment before trial, which weakens the system and prevents a proper organisation of the defence. Now, however, practically all agree that he made a mistake, as a jury of the people would never have condemned him, on the ground that there were others who were just as guilty as he. It must be remembered that for this same reason Commendator Tanlongo and the other accused in the Banca Romana scandals were absolved.

Out of the Nasi scandal and trial good will undoubtedly come, as it will tend to equalise the moral sense of the South with that of the North. It will represent a kind of brake on the ambition of all Ministers, who, in Italy, as in most of the Latin countries, are inclined to consider their career not as a public trust, and as a mission for the prosperity of the country, but as a pedestal for their ambitious dreams or their economic aggrandisement.—Yours, &c.,

SALVATORE CORTESI.

Rome, February 28th, 1908.

The Drama.

A PARABLE OF ENGLAND.

MR. BARRIE was not present at the Duke of York's Theatre on Monday night; if he had been, he might, being a modest man, have been surprised at the extreme warmth of the reception of the revival of "The Admirable Crichton." He need not have been surprised, for since Mr. Barrie wrote his satirical parable of modern England, a school of reflective, critical playwrights have arisen, and fully established their influence over the stage, limited as in the nature of things it must be. Mr. Shaw, Mr. Galsworthy, Mr. Barker, Mr. St. John Hankin, are all known and appraised, and even the vulgarity and emptiness of our theatrical season cannot now pass unseasoned by their work. The great actor-entertainers—the Trees, Alexanders, Wallers—do not want them. But they in their turn are no longer wanted by æsthetic, intellectual London, in the sense in which Sir Henry Irving was necessary to the more sensitive and highly trained playgoers of the "eighties."

To this upward movement of the theatrical world Mr. Barrie's "Admirable Crichton" has powerfully contributed. In England you can never be quite sure that anybody perceives anything. But Mr. Barrie, having cut himself free of his besetting prettiness and Scottish humorousness, and applying the charming and nimble movement of his mind to seeing things as they are, has produced something which, like "Gulliver's Travels," and all pictures of truth embodied in a tale, appeals both by its native grace and power to please, and by its ability to make people think, as well as laugh or feel. From the maze of silliness, sly sensuality, and padded dressmakers' romance, of which nine-tenths of current dramatic work is made up, this play is marked out by its sweetness of tone, by its intellectuality, slight but genuine, and by the author's power to put his finger on an ailment in modern life. Mr. Barrie is no Swift; coming to our own days, he wants Mr. Shaw's intellectual ruthlessness for social idols, and Mr. Galsworthy's ironic commiseration for those who suffer by them. But he has qualities that make him a more acceptable teacher than they for a great number of people who are vaguely concerned about life, and, discerning that something is wrong, would like to be shown the way out.

In "The Admirable Crichton" Mr. Barrie has chosen a singularly pregnant theme, the old theme of Inequality, on which Arnold preached to us so long, and to such deaf ears. For Inequality is England's especial vice and weakness. Politically, it is modified a little; socially, in the structure of our ideas and institutions, it persists as if it could never be uprooted. All its consequences—royalty-worship, rank-worship, wealth-worship, convention-worship, general inefficiency-worship—seem to grow even under the forms of democracy, and to make us more a nation of snobs than ever. Mr. Barrie, who is a Scotsman, able to penetrate the veil of our English self-satisfaction, looks at this feeling very shrewdly. The nation in which caste rules, necessarily makes masters of some of its weakest men, flunkies of its strongest. A good deal of southern England is possessed by what Mr. Shaw calls this "soul of a servant," that is to say, by a society in which competent helpful people, finding no career of true eminence open to them, find comfort and security in looking after the weak-minded folk who are set over them, and cannot be deposed. Happy thought! Illustrate this peculiarity of ours, this refusal to open careers to the talents, by the servants' hall in a nobleman's family. Show the Butler who would be (and was) King, the Lord who, in a return to nature, or to natural opportunity, could not even scour the true King's plates, and can only play silly tunes for his amusement. By this means Mr. Barrie brings his subject home to all our businesses and bosoms. Many there be among our middle or upper classes that on a desert island, where life becomes direct and simple, would be as hopelessly, and as rightfully, under their servants' thumbs as was the Earl of Loam under that beneficent despot, "The Admirable Crichton."

All this, therefore, is of the true material of comedy. Mr. Barrie shows what life with us is, and what it might be, seen through the bright mirror of a gay fancy. "Dinner irrespective of work," says society in Mayfair; "No work, no dinner," says society on the desert island, where the Butler King sits smoking calmly by the fire he has lit, and the food he has cooked, and waits for the little army of "detrimentials"—proud lords and fine ladies, and curates whose "bowling breaks both ways"—to creep back to them and to his feet. But this in itself would not have made the satire complete or sufficiently suggestive. The Butler King must round off his conquest. He must both "spare the conquered and beat down the proud." He must win the hearts and tame the wills of all his old masters and mistresses—make them grovel for his favours, and bow to his kiss. He must turn these listless bored beings, who fall asleep after dinner, into willing helpers of one another, all stepping into their proper places in a society where each kind of talent gets the economic and social reward proper to it, and no more, where the man rules who is fit to rule, and yet knows how to be a servant of all, and those obey whose small talents and usefulness are necessarily ordered and controlled by a benevolent "superman." On the island, therefore, everybody is happy, for everything is according to nature. Inequality still rules, but through the appropriate use of powers, not the waste and abuse of them. The Earl of Loam is content because Crichton rewards him with an egg for breakfast, as nurses reward good children. Lady Mary is content because she can win a love that fills her heart. Crichton is content because he can be a man at last. And then our playwright must show that all this is a dream, a show; that these things may happen on a desert island, but not in England, in London, where we have Houses of Lords, eldest sons, proprietries, class-marriages, good form, and self-deception about democracy. There our natural Kings must be Butlers, and our Queens "Tweenies" if they can be nothing else; the return to nature, or even such plausible suggestions of it as Revolutionary or Napoleonic France devised, can never take place. Such a society, says Mr. Barrie to us, is stronger than our strong men. It changes, devitalises them. "Don't lose your courage," cries Lady Mary, the "Polly" of the island, to her Butler-King, whom she leaves, with much sangfroid, to his consoling "Tweeny." But Crichton has lost his courage. He will make a little money at his public-house under the sign "The Case is Altered," still believing in "inequality," and possibly voting Tory with Lord Loam at the General Election. But he will not be an upstanding man again.

I have made a slight analysis of a delightful little fable, which is all the better for having the true fabular "sting in the tail." I have only to add that it is worked out, as its friends know, with great dramatic sharpness and precision—nothing could be better than the fireside scene, and the dancing scene, interrupted by the booming of the ship's gun—and is played with verve and energy.

M.

Letters to the Editor.

THE EDUCATION BILL.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—By admitting the principle of contracting-out, Mr. McKenna has at least cleared the issues. We shall at least know which schools are public, and which private; where religious tests are legitimate, and where illegal. Under the present Bill—

(1) Every parent obtains a statutory right to have his child educated in a free, publicly-managed school.

(2) Religious tests are made absolutely illegal in all public elementary schools.

(3) The education authorities are relieved from a very real responsibility for schools over which they have no real control.

(4) The administration is freed from the inevitable friction, suspicion, and jobbery involved in Clause IV. of the Bill of 1906.

(5) The difficulty of single-school areas is frankly faced, and the country saved from the educational danger of duplicating small, inefficient schools.

(6) Martyrdom is reduced to a matter of £ s. d. The genuine martyrs who for the last five years have been maintaining their schools without a penny of public money—as for instance at St. Peter's, London Docks, will now have their sufferings largely, if not wholly, relieved.

(7) Generous terms are offered to those trustees who voluntarily or compulsorily transfer their schools to the public. They can require the education authority to provide unsectarian religious teaching during school hours, and can claim every facility out of school hours to provide sectarian teaching for those who prefer it.

I know the weight of authority against contracting-out. Lord Stanley and Mr. Acland speak by general consent with unrivalled authority on all that concerns public education, and both are known to be bitterly opposed to any form of contracting-out. But in spite of obvious dangers, it does undeniably offer a possible and intelligible basis for compromise and settlement.

On the other hand, in the Bill as drafted, there are two or three flaws, which, if they are allowed to remain, may well wreck the Bill or gravely impair its value.

(1) The definition of a "single school parish" (clause 3 (6)) would exclude a large proportion of the schools which are apparently intended. Both parties admit that there are districts where there is only one school, and where for educational reasons there ought to be only one school. In these areas all parents must use the same school, and that school should be a public school. But such areas occur in "urban districts" as well as in "rural districts," and even civil parishes are often so large and so scattered that one parish may include several single-school areas. The term "school" is itself ambiguous. Single departments are technically termed schools.

I venture to suggest that the phrase "single-school area" should be substituted, and defined as "any area where, in the opinion of the Board of Education, it is undesirable for educational reasons that a second school should be built."

(2) The uniform grant has the merit of simplicity, but, I think, no other. In some districts it will be excessive, in others it will be quite inadequate, if the standard of efficiency is to be maintained.

Taking the last Blue-book (Cd. 3,886), we find the following typical cases:—

Area	Attendance.	Cost of		Cost per
		Maintenance.	Head.
		£	s.	d.
London	658,122	2,778,693	84	5
Essex (area under C. C.)	62,038	164,815	53	3
Derbyshire (area under C. C.)	79,947	190,051	47	8

(In Essex and Derby the boroughs are excluded, and only the area under the County Council taken into account. Capital expenditure is excluded.)

To these apply a uniform grant of 47s. plus special grants, say 48s. a head, and we see that in London a grant of 48s. would leave on an average 36s. a head to be found by fees or subscriptions. In Essex 5s. a head only would be needed. In Derbyshire there would actually be a surplus to divide among the schools.

But these are wide areas. The actual variation from school to school would be far greater. In London the deficit might be very considerably greater. In Derbyshire the surplus would often be much more.

Such a proposal seems to me indefensible. I am aware that the standard of the Board of Education is elastic, and that the children have always been sacrificed where necessary to the managers. The report from which I am quoting shows that last year the annual grant was only refused in the case of one department in all England! But the meaning of Clause 2 (2) c. should be that the same conditions of efficiency as are required in public elementary schools shall be required in these private schools too; and, if so, their cost of maintenance should not be greatly different from that of other schools in the same district. If so, the grant also should bear some relation to the general cost; and I would willingly see it fixed at not more than four-fifths of the general cost of maintenance in the district, provided that the remaining fifth were contributed by bonâ-fide voluntary effort, from which I would exclude endowments and fees.

I think, too, that we should insist upon the same standard of salaries in voluntary and public schools. The Archbishop of Canterbury offered to accept such a proposal two years ago.

The result of a proportionate grant would be to exterminate the inefficient schools. The result of a uniform grant is likely to be the extermination of the most efficient.

(3) But there is another reason why a certain proportion of bonâ-fide voluntary support should be required. Without it, and with a fixed grant, there is grave danger of a series of 6d. and 9d. schools arising, supported entirely by fees and grants, and appealing solely to the very detestable but very real desire in every class for social exclusiveness. The average cost of maintenance throughout England, excluding London, is well under 60s. a head. Even in great towns, such as Sheffield and Leeds, that cost is barely exceeded. A fixed grant of 48s. with a 6d. fee would produce 70s.; with a 9d. fee it would produce 80s.

For these reasons I hope to see the uniform grant withdrawn and a proportionate grant substituted, together with stringent conditions of efficiency. I confess I should like to see this grant paid through the local education authority, and (subject to appeal to the Board of Education) made subject to its control and discretion. After all, the local authority must be responsible for the organisation of the education of its whole district. Even though the rates were to some extent involved, I would defy Mr. Balfour and Mr. Hirst Hollowell, and spend them. But this is a wider question, and I have trespassed more than abundantly on your space.—Yours, &c.,

Loughton, March 3rd, 1908.

G. L. BRUCE.

THE NEW BOTANY.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I am an old-fashioned botanist, of the kind described in your issue of February 29th, and have spent many happy days in "carefully collecting, drying, and naming wild plants"; and I could show you some 2,000 or 3,000 British specimens "neatly fastened to sheets of paper" by my sister and myself. Our father and mother were both addicted to the same pursuit, and so were both our grandfathers.

Of the second kind of botanical study which you describe I know nothing, and have no idea whatever of the substance or identity of either "prosenchyma" or "parenchyma." But when you begin to speak of a plant as "a living creature," and of its relation to its surroundings, I feel myself in the forefront, instead of hopelessly behind, the times. The chief botanical field-work of our family was done in the neighbourhood of the great Craven Fault, in the West Riding, and it was quite commonplace knowledge with us that such and such plants grew only on limestone, and others only on millstone grit, while the slate occurring here and there in patches produced yet another distinct "association." My mother would often tell, from the plants we brought home, in which direction we had been hunting for specimens. Occasionally on these hills there is a vein or lode of lead near the surface, and we learned from our grandfather (who was born in 1793) how to distinguish these patches. There, and nowhere else, were found two distinctive plants: Thlaspi alpestre, Linn. var. occitanum (Jord.), and Arenaria verna, Linn. Both are rare plants, but associate together abundantly in these circumscribed spaces, where they can feed upon the lead so necessary to their being.

Thus you will see that the "New Botany," like some other "new" things, is not altogether a novelty after all. I am delighted to learn that this "new" fascinating form of an old fascinating study is being pursued and made use of.—Yours, &c.,

FRANCES P. LOOSMORE.

38, Wellington Street, Blackburn,
March 1st, 1908.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—May a dilettante student of natural objects thank you for your very suggestive article last week under this heading, and express a hope that you will one day follow it up with more? The idea of plant association is one that cannot have failed to strike everyone who walks about the country with eyes in his head, and if worked out by modern scientific methods, can hardly fail to affect all plant cultivation, whether economical or ornamental. Long ago, noticing that the grass you speak of (which is much the same as the "couch" detested of gardeners) grew freely in those parts of my own garden (on the "Bagshot beds" of North-west Surrey) which had been left uncultivated, I was led to introduce the wild hyacinth among it, and the experiment succeeded quite well. My garden is full of birches, and beside almost every birch a holly has established itself, not always, I must admit, to its own best advantage. Still, they live and grow. Again, the common cow-parsley grows freely under elms, scantily, if at all, under oaks. I know a lane with elms on one side and oaks on the other. Go there a couple of months hence, and you will see one side clad with the spray-like blossoms, over the delicately cut foliage, of the humble umbellifer, while the other side is quite differently adorned.—Yours, &c.,

A. J. B.

March 4th, 1908.

THE PROBLEM OF THE LORDS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The Licensing Bill, the Education Bill, and all Liberal measures are subject to a great deal of work, and then the Lords may be expected to do the usual thing. But the criticism of these measures in the country weakens the party now in power, and causes electoral defeats. Why should the farce go on? The sooner the people are called upon to vote on a definite Bill for the abolition of the Lords' veto the better. We may lose if the people like the system, but a weak Protectionist Government during a time of bad trade and Irish discontent, accompanied by the rumbling of Socialism, would not be quite so bad as ploughing sand. The Lords yield to fear, but they may get stronger if the tactics of Mr. Balfour go on too far. Suppose we have an attempt to give the country a sample of Messrs. Chaplin and Chamberlain's Tariff mixture, which is to wipe out the income tax, and provide social reform, and increased wages with employment for all out of work. The difficulties which our Government are struggling against are not of our making. Why should the Liberal Party be called upon to leave a handsome surplus for the Tories to spend as they always do, in filling the pockets of their friends? Is it a fact that once the taxes are put on, it is so difficult to get them off again? The Corn Tax was put on and taken off, and our dependence on foreign supplies would make the Tariff professors exceedingly careful, or revolution might be the consequence. If we must have the Lords, a weak Tory Government and a strong united Free Trade Opposition is preferable.—Yours, &c.,

EDWIN HILL.

Leamington, February 29th, 1908.

"THE SUFFRAGISTS AND THE LAW."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Your correspondent, W. M. C., writing on "The Suffragists and the Law," criticises the action taken by the arrested Suffragists in the police court. He expresses surprise that fifty of these women submitted their interests to the hustling of the prosecution and allowed themselves to be proceeded against as mere rowdies.

Allow me to explain that it does not rest with the Suffragists themselves to choose the manner in which the authorities shall proceed against them. In sending the deputation of thirteen persons to the House of Commons, we challenged the authorities to put into operation against us the Act of Charles II. Had they done so, there would have been a trial in the High Court and the accused would have had the opportunity of laying all the facts of the case before the Court. The prosecution decided, however, once more to attempt to mislead the public by treating the purely political offence of the Suffragists as a street brawl.

Those who are familiar with police-court procedure will understand how difficult, nay, impossible, it was for our friends to make an adequate statement of their case. The fact that the majority of them were not defended by a solicitor or counsel made no difference. One of the women was so represented, yet she shared the fate of her colleagues. It may be that on future occasions the members of our Union will have the benefit of a fair trial, but in any case, as your correspondent's letter itself proves, the public are on the way to understand, in spite of misrepresentation, that the militant Suffragists are not wanton disturbers of the peace, but are public-spirited women taking what they believe to be necessary action in the interests of public liberty.—Yours, &c.,

CHRISTABEL PANKHURST.

February 29th, 1908.

"VOTES FOR WOMEN AND THE LIBERAL PARTY."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—One of the objects of the Women's Liberal Association is to press forward the question of the Parliamentary Enfranchisement of Women. This, in fact, is the only item on their agenda which, peculiarly, refers to women in politics.

It is the duty of the Liberal Government to carry out the reform of enfranchising women at as early a date as possible, because, in the House, there is a majority pledged to support Women's Suffrage. It also behoves a Liberal Government to do so, because of their avowed fundamental principle that taxation without representation is tyranny, and they indignantly repudiate the charge of being tyrants. Women cannot wait until all other Liberal reforms are carried, because they have already waited too long, and their need is doubly pressing, for, in addition to the franchise, Liberal women likewise demand the same reforms as Liberal men. Many of them are quite as much against a State Church and Tariff Reform as any Nonconformist or Free Trader. If there are women who declare themselves Liberals first and women second, there are also many others who are first and foremost women and second Liberals. The bye-election policy of the Suffragists has in different places made Liberal women reflect and, in more than one instance, Liberal women have left these Associations because they felt that until they had a vote they were merely doormats of the party for which they worked. Daily there are being added recruits to the Non-party Suffrage societies as, by this policy alone, women have come to see that their enfranchisement will be obtained. Women who are keen on the question of Woman's Suffrage are working at present for the removal of sex disability in political matters, and their demand is that the Parliamentary Franchise be granted to women on the same terms as it now is, or may be later, granted to men. No other measure will satisfy them.

In conclusion, I would only add, as a ci-devant Liberal woman, formerly a member of a Liberal Women's Committee and treasurer of a Liberal Women's Association, that with others I left the W.L.A. because of the reactionary policy advocated in your paper by "Woman Liberal." During the past year throughout the country Liberal women made it a point at their meetings to disavow all dealings with the Suffragists, and made gratuitous apologies for the militant tactics.

In answer to the last question of "Woman Liberal," the indifferent majority enfranchised at the demand of an earnest minority would become less indifferent when they exercised their vote, and in the words of Mr. Herbert Gladstone, on Friday, February 28th, "the power to vote would stimulate their activities in a thousand ways and would improve their present status, especially in the industrial world," and that is the opinion of a non-fanatical supporter of the Women's Franchise Movement.—Yours, &c.,

ELIZ. B. S. WILKINSON.

Newcastle-on-Tyne, March 1st, 1908.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—May I be allowed a little space to reply to the letter of "Woman Liberal" in your last issue? I felt as I read it immensely sorry for the poor writer. She suggests that every right-minded Liberal woman should be a Liberal before she is a woman. I have yet to learn that babies are born little Liberals or little Tories, and I think I know something about babies. I always found them born little girls or little boys, very hard to differentiate wholly from each other for some years to come, as the Liberalism, or whatever it was to be, seldom came till after their teens. I am afraid I think a woman who is a Liberal first is not a true woman, and can have no real mother's heart, whose first need in life is to gather all helpless little ones into her arms. I am afraid the poor lady who wrote that letter has missed the inner meaning of the woman's struggle to-day. The struggle is so powerful; frail and delicate women fling themselves against giant policemen, even against House of Commons walls, as a wren does when her nest is attacked; because somehow, we hardly know how, a renewed hope has arisen, a fire has been lit, and has now got to be kept alight till the end. Women have had a glimpse of what their power might be if they used it openly and honestly, letting the truth that is in them find expression, and they are asking that they shall be freed to help and to heal and to save, as they know wise legislation can help them to do. They have begun in earnest to believe that their desires to help their race are no longer to be hemmed in by powerlessness and disability of political non-responsibility.

I was converted to Woman Suffrage forty years ago by John Stuart Mill himself in person, and at first respectable old Suffragists like myself were taken aback by the fiery vehemence of the younger blood that suddenly boiled up in our midst. But now we understand, and we are only too thankful a new fire is alight, and know we shall be fools and worse unless we keep it alight with all the power that is in us. Forty years we worked away patiently, now and then with a cry of hope deferred; year after year men have said to us, "Wait just a little longer, till this or that reform is carried," and we have waited times out of number. Now we see we have been too patient; we have been unwisely unselfish; we have even fallen into the unnatural position of being Liberals rather than women. And when sometimes we have made a strong forward movement, we were hampered by the backsliding of feebler ones in our ranks. Only latterly a once useful political woman receded from the Women's Liberal Federation because she thought they made too much point of the suffrage. They were selfish over it; other things were more important on the Liberal programme. She made a most pitiful speech, appealing to others to back her, but the womanly hearts she spoke to were true, and would have none of it. They voted against her in overwhelming numbers, and she went away and left us to help a man get into Parliament who had always said he was an enemy to votes for women, and actively organised opposition in the House to Mr. Stanger's Bill. That poor woman of unclear vision may feel some remorse now; with her lips she still says she believes in the suffrage, with her hand she works against.

And now it is ours to honour and to back the brave women who have made the bold forward move. As we listen to Mrs. Billington-Grieg or Christabel Pankhurst, or that exquisite little orator, Mrs. Philip Snowden, who speaks straight and simply from a true and single heart, we see that they and the others are heroines. Comic papers and "Punch" influence us very much just now; if "Punch" were not missing the inner meaning of the struggle, we should see in his pages the "Suffragette" not as a screaming woman, but as a strong and forcible and beautiful Joan of Arc, doing nobler work than Joan of Arc did, for she drove out the foreign invader, and these would work to heal wounds of some souls and bodies, here and now, and close round their own doorsteps.—Yours, &c.,

March 3rd, 1908.

E. C.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The attitude of your correspondent, "Liberal Woman," on the above subject appears to me one more illustration of the paralysing effect on women of their exclusion from active and responsible political life. Professing the conviction that qualified women should be enfranchised, she yet occupies two columns of THE NATION in setting forth reasons why they should do nothing to urge their claims upon the Government. The arguments used are for the most part of the "well-worn and worm-eaten" variety, and instances are given of the enormity of being "woman first and Liberal after," as if Woman Suffrage were an anti-Liberal doctrine. One's own experience is that the most truly democratic Liberal woman is the keenest Suffragist, and the assertion that "fully fifty per cent. of Conservative women" are anti-suffrage would seem to confirm this view.

We are told the Government should not be "worried" because they are not pledged. And why are they not pledged? Simply because Suffragists have been too timid hitherto—too "loyal"—to insist on pledges with the same determination as men. Lacking the power of the vote, they must now bring pressure to bear on the Government in every legitimate way open to them. They are told their cause must be "submitted to the whole electorate." How can this be accomplished unless women can prevail upon the Government to include the suffrage in the official party programme, so that it may come before the country in leading speeches and in the Press? Women are too heavily handicapped to rely solely on methods of quiet education and peaceful persuasion of individuals. They realise that "Spade-work" alone will not win any great reform.

We have now won a frank admission from leading members of the Government that women's claim to the vote is just and right, that "so far as argument is concerned, the victory is won." Is this, then, a time to relax the urgency of that claim? Should we not be pressing for the logical and well-earned fruits of that victory? In reply to your correspondent's question to Liberal women, I know many who would join me in asking, "Is it in accordance with political wisdom" that any duly qualified members of the community should be denied the rights of citizenship and so converted into bitter and irritated opponents of the Government? Or "is it in accordance with political morality" that a Government professedly based on democratic principles and admitting the justice and rightness of Woman Suffrage should continue to refuse a pledge that it will deal with this question, or at least admit it as an item of the Liberal programme?—Yours, &c.,

March 2nd, 1908.

EMILY ASHTON.

AUSTRO-HUNGARY.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Will you permit me respectfully to point out that it is neither correct nor wise to use the word "Austria" as you sometimes do, when both Austria and Hungary are intended?

These two independent States are absolutely equal in rank, and each has an equal voice in the settlement of those affairs which, by treaty, they have decided to carry jointly.

The Ministers for the common affairs have to submit their proposals separately to the Austrian and to the Hungarian Delegations.

These two Committees separately consider the proposals, and, having no legislative power whatever, eventually report thereon to their respective Parliaments. The supreme power to accept or to reject the reports of the Delegations rests with the two Parliaments—with the Hungarian as much as with the Austrian.

Why, then, should Hungary always be ignored?

You may be surprised to hear that the two Delegations have only once assembled in the same building, and that was in 1880, and on that occasion, both the Austrian and the Hungarian Presidents presided!

While there is legal provision that such meetings may be held, the practice, in case of disagreement, now is for a sub-committee of four members from each Delegation to meet and try to arrive at an understanding. If they fail to agree, for instance, as to the amount of money or the number of men or ships to be provided, then the lowest figures which have been mentioned are taken as those to be recommended for adoption by the Delegations, who in turn submit them for legalisation, or otherwise, to the two Parliaments.

The consent of the two Parliaments is absolutely necessary, as neither the one nor the other alone can carry on the business of the two States.

The statement in "The Statesman's Year Book," which conflicts with the above, will be altered in the new edition.—Yours, &c.,

W. H. SHREBSOLE.

173, Brownhill Road,
Catford, London, S.E.

March 1st, 1908.

AN INTERCHANGE OF COMPLIMENTS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—As one who is lucky enough to read both "The National Review" and "The Observer" it gives me no little satisfaction to see the high esteem in which the editors of those two journals hold each other. Thus in the current number of "The National Review" Mr. Maxse tells us that "The Observer" "is edited by one of the keenest political intellects in the country." The last issue of "The Observer" replies in kind. "It would not be too much to say," we read, "that the 'National Review,' under the editorship of Mr. Leo Maxse, has become not only the most vital and virile, but the most famous and quoted among all monthly magazines in the world." Happy the country and fortunate the cause served by two journals of such outstanding perfection.—Yours, &c.,

NATIONAL OBSERVER.

Chiswick, March 1st, 1908.

Poetry.

THE AWAKENING.

ONCE she woke to fairy-land,
Now she wakes to grief,
All the golden days are gone,
Lost by time—the thief.

Once she sprang to meet the dawn,
Now so loth to rise;
She to greet the coming day
Opens heavy eyes.

Singing bird and budding trees,
Bloom of rose unfurled,
All her hopes are far from these
In the under-world.

What for her the upper-earth?
Lone she wanders here.
Silent in the underground
They who held her dear;

In the happy night they rise,
Each beloved face;
Phantoms circling by her couch
Hold her in embrace.

See! she springs to meet the day,
Up with eager breath,
Then remembering, prays for sleep,
Sleep so like to death.

DORA SIGERSON SHORTER.

The World of Books.

THURSDAY EVENING.

THROUGH the industry and piety of Mr. W. M. Rossetti we have already a mass of information about the gifted family of which he is a member. The number of books upon the subject is shortly to be increased by the publication of "The Letters of Christina Rossetti," which Messrs. Brown, Langham & Co. have in the press. The book will contain some hitherto unpublished letters by Dante Gabriel Rossetti, but is chiefly composed of letters addressed by Christina Rossetti to the members of her own family. Literary matters and also religious convictions form an element in the correspondence, though its chief constituent is the family affection which was so large a factor in Christina Rossetti's character. Mr. W. M. Rossetti contributes notes which form connecting links between the letters, so that the book will be a valuable supplement to Mr. Mackenzie Bell's "Life." Some of Christina Rossetti's verdicts on literary and artistic questions are characteristic of her temperament. Thus she writes to her brother, "I hope you like Mme. D'Arblay in moderation: we both do. The 'Arabian Nights' is far above my praise." When the "Eminent Women" Series was projected she wrote "Mrs. Fry I would gladly try at, nor do I fancy I should find Lady Augusta Stanley insurmountable: I should decline the two Georges (George Sand and George Eliot), and prefer leaving Miss Martineau." The following extract is taken from a letter written to her by Mr. Swinburne accompanying two copies of his volume 'A Century of Roundels.'

"If the references to Dante and Farinata à propos of caverns in Guernsey seem strange or far-fetched to you, I wish you—as a poetess, and his country-woman—would go and see that wonderful sight for yourself, which I have so faintly tried to indicate. It is amazing to me that so few English folk will trouble themselves to make so short a run to see within their own territory landscapes and prospects to which I really know no parallel—not even in the Highlands, the Apennines, or the Pyrenees—for splendour and variety of sublimity and beauty. Nowhere else, that I ever saw or heard of, is there such a sea for background to such shores—or such land for background to such seas—as in Sark and Guernsey. Watts said of the latter, when we were roaming over it last year—'I did not think there was such an island as this in the world!' It has literally every kind of loveliness and grandeur packed into it—you step as it were out of the Hebrides into Tuscany in a few miles' walk—or you pass from the valleys of the Spey or the ravine of the Findhorn straight into Valdarno or Valdesa. And, if you don't believe me on trust, all I can say is, do go and see, and give these almost unknown beauties a word of song—as I have tried to do."

"THE Life and Letters of George Jacob Holyoake," which Messrs. Watts & Co. are to publish early next month, should prove a biography of uncommon value and interest. Apart from his active share in the Co-operative Movement and his work as a secularist teacher and lecturer, the story of Holyoake's life takes us behind the scenes of many of the great agitations on behalf of social reform during the past century. He was a follower of Robert Owen, a worker in the moderate wing of the Chartist body, the secretary of the Committee that organised Garibaldi's British Legion, and he helped to abolish the stamp-duty on newspapers and the travelling tax. We understand that the book will throw fresh light of importance upon the debated question of Garibaldi's sudden flight from England in 1864, as well as upon Orsini's attempt on the life of Napoleon III. Its main interest, however, lies in home politics, for Holyoake's life illustrates in a peculiar way the process by which the Utopian dreams of Place and the early Chartists settled down into the practical ideals advocated by the Radical and Labour Parties of our own day.

FROM the same publishers we are to have Mr. A. W. Benn's "Modern England: A Record of Opinion and Action from the Time of the French Revolution to the Present Day." Mr. Benn's aim has been to bring into prominence those general tendencies by which social changes are ultimately determined, and he attempts to show that there is no adequate basis for many historical judgments now widely held. For instance, the services rendered to good government by the philosophical Radicals, have, in Mr. Benn's opinion, been strangely overlooked even by their special historians, such as Sir Leslie Stephen, while Professor Dicey, in his book on "Law and Opinion," has exaggerated the part given to individualism and laissez-faire in the philosophy of Bentham and his school. Mr. Benn also takes the view that the credit for philanthropic legislation so freely given by modern Tories to the Tory Party at the expense of the Whigs and Radicals is totally unjustified. Canning comes in for high praise. "He has not yet received anything like his due meed of recognition as a 'hero of the nations,' and the same applies with even greater force to Canning's true successor, Palmerston." "The serious errors that mark Palmerston's closing years have somewhat clouded his reputation. But they are errors inspired by the same noble love of justice and freedom which, together with a patriotism more antique than modern, was the moving principle of his whole political career." This view finds undoubted support in the recent volumes of Queen Victoria's "Letters," which go far to rehabilitate Palmerston as a great Foreign Minister and a very powerful friend of European freedom.

THE present year will see the publication of at least three new books by Mr. H. G. Wells. A study of social conditions called "New Worlds for Old" was issued last week by Messrs. Constable; "The Pall Mall Magazine" is publishing "The War in the Air," a remarkable anticipation of the devastating power which the development of aerial navigation is certain to bring with it; and another journal has secured the serial rights of "Tono Bungay," a new novel which, we understand, Mr. Wells considers to be his best work. The hero of the story makes a fortune out of the sale of a patent medicine.

MR. ARNOLD BENNETT is at work on a romantic story based upon the Druce case. A list of the novels which have been inspired by famous legal trials would be a curious one. The Tichborne case, although providing excellent material for the novelist, does not seem to have given rise to any work of outstanding merit.

STUDENTS of the drama will be glad to hear that Mrs. Dowden, whose skill as a translator was shown in the fine rendering of Goethe's "Iphigenie," published a few years ago, has just completed an English version of several of Franz Grillparzer's dramas. The famous Austrian poet is little known in this country, and it was not until the last quarter of the nineteenth century, when their author was old and embittered by neglect, that his plays received recognition, even in Germany. Byron was one of the first Englishmen to recognise Grillparzer's genius. In his diary for 1821 he speaks of "the German Grillparzer—a devil of a name, to be sure, for posterity; but they must learn to pronounce it"; and he adds that "Grillparzer is grand—antique—not so simple as the ancients, but very simple for a modern—too Madame de Staël, now and then—but altogether a great and goodly writer."

BOOKS TO BE READ:—

- "Modern Egypt." By the Earl of Cromer. (Macmillan 2 vols. 24s. net.)
- "New Worlds for Old." By H. G. Wells. (Constable. 6s.)
- "Letters of the Wordsworth Family, 1787 to 1855." Compiled and Edited by William Knight. (Ginn. 3 vols. 31s. 6d. net.)
- "A History of Modern Liberty." Vol. III. The Struggle with the Stuarts. By James Mackinnon. (Longmans. 15s. net.)
- "English Local Government from the Revolution to the Municipal Corporations Act: The Manor and the Borough." By Sidney and Beatrice Webb. (Longmans. 2 vols. 25s. net.)
- "English Society in the Eleventh Century: Essays in English Mediæval History." By Parl Vinogradoff. (Clarendon Press. 16s. net.)
- "The Socialist Movement in England." By Brougham Villiers. (Unwin. 10s. 6d. net.)
- "The Man who was Thursday." By G. K. Chesterton. (Arrow-smith. 6s.)
- "Rachel Chalfont." By Sophie Cole. (Duckworth. 6s.)
- "La Crête ancienne." Par R. P. Lagrange. (Paris. Lecoqfré. 8 fr.)
- "Mélanges et documents, publiés à l'occasion du 2e Centenaire de la mort de Mabilon." (Paris. Champion. 10 fr.)
- "Les Cervelines." Roman. Par Colette Yver. (Paris. Juven. 3 fr. 50.)
- "Märchen Dichtung der Romantiker." Von Rich. Benz. (Gotha: Perthes. M. 5.)

Reviews.

A SHELLEY AFFINITY.*

MR. BERTRAM DOBELL, who has given good gifts to lovers of our literature, now adds a new gift by the publication for the first time of forty-six letters of Shelley, written between June, 1811, and June, 1812, to Elizabeth Hitchener, which were printed for private circulation by Mr. Thomas J. Wise in 1900 in an edition consisting of only thirty copies. Mr. Dobell prefixes an interesting Introduction of fifty pages, and adds such notes as are necessary for the elucidation of the letters. Miss Hitchener, who had been a school-mistress, much respected and loved by her pupils, was still unmarried when in 1822 she published at the age of forty a topographical poem, "The Weald of Kent." We learn from Mr. Dobell that at some later date she married an officer in the Austrian service, and went abroad with him. "Before leaving this country she deposited with her solicitor, Mr. John Slack, the Shelley letters, together with transcripts of some of her own letters to him. These she never reclaimed, and Mr. Slack heard no more of her." With Mr. Slack's permission transcripts of the Shelley letters were made more than twenty years ago by Mr. W. M. Rossetti, and again in 1896 by Mr. Wise. Their biographical value for the year in which Shelley married his first wife and was alienated from Hogg, his Oxford companion, is great.

They are, regarded from one point of view, as foolish letters as ever were written by an ardent boy; from a different point of view we can discern in them the possibilities of a poet or a martyr or a saint. The protoplasm from which a fool and that from which a man of genius—at least one type of man of genius—may afterwards be developed, are, at a certain stage, hardly distinguishable by the microscope. The molecular combination of carbon, oxygen, and their fellows, is, as the handbooks would tell us, highly complex and unstable. But we perceive, whatever may hereafter come of it, that the protoplasm is keenly responsive to external stimuli, and has a capacity of spontaneous movement. The man of genius whose head is capacious, like that of Edmund Burke, a head in which there is room not only for ideas, but for all their conditions and qualifications, will probably in boyhood as well as in maturity be very unlike a fool—Sancho Panza already rides in his brain behind Don Quixote. But many distinguished lovers and saints and martyrs and musicians and reformers of the world had brains exquisitely organised, but which did not, like Cuvier's weigh an inordinate number of grammes. Perhaps the protoplasm from which were individualised those cells afterwards evolved into what we know as St. Francis of Assisi (divine madman, full of the wisdom of love!), had it only an infinitesimal particle less of hydrogen, or a particle more of nitrogen, might have produced not St. Francis but Tom Noddy. Shelley's brain, at all events, was singularly small; but it was finely organised; it had room for the most vital and luminous ideas; only when these ideas asked for space to spread their wings, the qualifications and circumstances of the ideas had to withdraw, in order to make room for those bright and swift pinions.

In the logic of his conduct, and sometimes in the logic of his writings, the major premiss is often luminously true, and far above the apprehension of many men who are proud of what they call good sense. The minor premiss is often a hasty, unwarranted assumption. To be useful to one's species is a duty—that is an excellent major premiss. To rush over to Ireland and fling pamphlets from a balcony in Sackville Street at "likely" passers-by is to be useful to one's species—that is not quite so well ascertained a minor premiss. But once proved by the logic of nonage to be a duty, St. Percy Quixote instantly starts for Dublin, accompanied by Harriett, and the inevitable Eliza Westbrook, and with his pamphlets "excites," as he naively remarks, "a sensation of wonder in Dublin." There will always be persons who dismiss Shelley with a superior smile because his minor premiss was hastily caught out of the air; there will always be persons who honour him for his loyalty to his own logic, which started from so generous and just a major premiss. Why should we not do both? And why should we not perceive that though wisdom comes slowly to a man who cannot easily and surely connect the abstract with the concrete, Shelley was steadily advancing up to the close towards the true and rare wisdom of sane enthusiasms?

In February, 1812, only one thing was needed to solve for ever the Irish problem, and, perhaps, from Dublin, as a centre of light, to regenerate Europe, to bring in the world's great age anew, and bid the golden years return—only one thing, the presence in Shelley's lodgings of another Eliza in addition to Eliza Westbrook—an Elizabeth not the sister of his wife but the "sister of his soul," whom mortals named Miss Hitchener. "Let us mingle," writes Shelley, "our identities inseparably, and burst upon tyrants with the accumulated impetuosity of our acquirements and resolutions. I am eager, firm, convinced." Was ever boy more absurd? Be it so; but in that sentence lay the germ of "Laon and Cythna" and in "Laon and Cythna" lay the promise of "The Triumph of Life." The blossom of wisdom in the boy Shelley, which lay wrapped in the sheath of folly, is to be found in the possibility of admiration, hope, and love, not yet well and wisely fixed, but capable of being so fixed when pain had matured the mind. The Elizabeth Hitchener to whom these letters are addressed was a huge Brocken shadow thrown on the mist-banks at sunrise, on which stalked also the monstrous shadows of kings and priests. It was a mist-bank of illusion; but the sunrise was a reality.

To this enormous Brocken shadow Shelley addresses himself in a style of writing, which, as Mr. Dobell observes, seems often modelled on the style of the worst Minerva press novels. The age of sensibility and of crude romance, before Scott had published Waverley, lay behind and around him, and the gaunt abstractions of revolutionary doctrine must be decked and bedizened in the cheap trappings of the time. Of amorous sentiment, in the common meaning of the word, there is none. Shelley is careful to assure his correspondent that such sentiment or such regard as a husband has for a wife is infinitely beneath the exalted feeling which binds him to the sister of his soul. It may be that Mr. Dobell is not far astray when he writes: "Few women desire to be admired for their intellect or talent, if that admiration is not conjoined with some regard for their persons; and I feel sure that Miss Hitchener would have been content if Shelley had rated her mental qualities much less highly, provided she could have flattered herself that love had at least a little share in attracting him towards her." Love in this sense there was none; that subordinate tribute to her youth, innocence, and beauty was received by Harriett. But in the play of brain with brain, though Shelley would have indignantly denied it, there is a charm of sex; and it may be questioned whether the spectre of the Brocken would have loomed quite so large if it had been that of a school-master of Hurstpierpoint and the son, not the daughter, of an ex-smuggler and the keeper of a public-house. Even the Saints have found more frequently exalted sisters than brothers of their souls. The sequel in the case of Shelley is well known—the disillusioning, towards which Harriett and Eliza Westbrook lent their assistance. The veiled glory of this lawless universe was transformed into the "Brown Demon." Shelley passed from one injustice to the opposite injustice—"My astonishment at my fatuity, inconsistency, and bad taste was never so great as after living for four months with her as an inmate. What would hell be were such a woman in heaven?" Poor Brown Demon, doubly wronged by admiration and by disdain!

EDWARD DOWDEN.

ABBE LOISY ON THE SYNOPTICS.*

THE religious, and especially the dogmatically religious mind, is curiously incapable of a cold impersonal criticism of a work in any way bearing on religion. Such work interests it as a clue to the author's unrevealed convictions, as a piece of evidence for an inquisitorial process. Numbers who have not the slightest interest or competence in New

* "Letters from Percy Bysshe Shelley to Elizabeth Hitchener: Now first published." With an Introduction and Notes. London: Bertram Dobell. 5s. net.

* "Les Évangiles Synoptiques." Par Alfred Loisy. Two Vols. Chez l'Auteur. Ceffonds, Hte. Marne. 30 fr.

Testament criticism will rush eagerly to M. Loisy's weighty volumes on the Synoptic Gospels solely to find out what he personally believes about the Virgin Birth or the Resurrection, not what criticism thinks of those and a hundred other questions. He may repeat, till he is hoarse, that he writes en savant; that he applies a method which he did not invent, and draws conclusions for which the method is responsible and not he; that the only legitimate refutation of those conclusions is to attack the method or show that he has misapplied it. The former has been attempted by the authors of the "Encyclical Pascendi"—not very successfully. The latter, no doubt, will be attempted and with some measure of success by scholars who know that the method has come to stay. The coldest of critics—and M. Loisy is nothing if not cold—is not wholly free from some bias of feeling that determines his election where evidence is not coercive and where there is a choice of probabilities. Often, in the believer—and M. Loisy is nothing if not a believer—the fear of bias is itself a bias. Often coldness itself is as unfavourable to true intuition as intemperate warmth. Perhaps, too, M. Loisy is not above an understandable desire to make hide-bound orthodoxy wince. He would be the last to claim infallibility as a critic. He writes, not for believers, but for critics, and invites refutation in the interests of scientific truth. Theologians will say that he goes too far; critics may prove that he goes too fast. Undoubtedly he is nearer the extreme left than the extreme right. Wiser than more moderate and temporising theologians, the Encyclical perceives that this "more or less" is irrelevant; that the critical method, if allowed at all, must justify M. Loisy's distinction between faith-truth and history-truth with all its consequences.

For the unwary interviewer and his sort, that distinction means that faith can believe in an occurrence which history has disproved, or at least in one which history cannot prove. It really means that the same statement may stand for an event in history and for an event in the spiritual order; and that the truth of these events may sometimes be independent of one another. That Christ was the Son of God and was crucified for us are spiritual facts that depend on the historical facts (true equally for believer and infidel) of his existence and crucifixion. That "He rose again for our justification" is a spiritual fact which does not so necessarily depend on the historical fact of the empty tomb. Nothing, not even the testimony of an angel, can make an historical fact a matter of faith, or more than a presupposition of the interpretation which faith gives to it. Given the credible testimony of an angel, the Virgin Birth is as much a matter of historical knowledge, as little a matter of faith as is the Crucifixion—whether for believer or unbeliever. Only its spiritual interpretation could be matter of faith. If it needed no faith to see Christ ascending bodily into Heaven, can it need faith to know the fact through the testimony of others, be they men or angels, as we might know the history of Waterloo? Nothing more elementary; nothing more hopelessly forgotten—thanks to the ambiguity of the word "faith." Thus, miracles that first were matters of knowledge and arguments of faith, have now come to be matters of faith, with inexpressibly confusing results. It is for the critic to determine how much of the Gospel story is historical fact from which faith has drawn its spiritual truths; how much is historical fiction in which that faith has re-expressed itself, which is true for faith but not for history. Thus it is that M. Loisy defends his liberty as a critic, and reconciles it with his faith as a Catholic.

It is far too soon, even for experts, to pass any sort of critical judgment on a work of such extent and profundity. The summary of results would be less startling if it were placed and read after instead of before the investigations on which they are based. But for theologians who will not trouble about the latter the present arrangement is very convenient. Still, the proportion of authentic matter, especially as regards the discourses and parables of Christ, is very considerable; and provides a solid historical basis or text for the interpretation of faith. If the historicity of some hitherto uncertain points can no longer be maintained according to this method, that of others is delivered from uncertainty. Where we had two or three incompatible accounts of the same event or utterance, all equally dubious, certainty has been secured to one by the elimination of the others. So, as regards Christ's prayer in Gethsemane; the story of Peter's denials; the trial of Christ before Caiphas. Again, certain grave inconsistencies vanish just because criticism can trace them to interpolation. The so-called "Little Apocalypse" is inconsistent with the asserted suddenness and unexpectedness of the Parusia. But if it is a Jewish document incorporated by Mark, we can conclude that Christ looked for an immediate and abrupt Parusia, heralded by no such extended series of warnings; that the "Apocalypse" was incorporated later to explain the delay of his coming. Again, M. Loisy explodes the fallacy of the "triple concord" according to which what is found in three Gospels is surer than what is found in two or one. The canon is invalid. What is found in one may be, and sometimes is, surer than what is found in three. Thus, much is saved which that rule was supposed to have destroyed. He regards Mark as a derivative, not as a primitive document; as worked up, like Matthew and Luke, from two sources, in one of which the utterances of Christ, in the other of which his actions hold the predominant place. He finds the influence of Paulinism guiding this work of selection and construction far beyond what has hitherto been supposed. As Matthew tried to correct and supersede Mark, so Luke tried to correct and supersede both in the light of the same sources.

Once more, let us protest against those who would read the labours of science with the spectacles of theology. If the method is true and its application legitimate we must accept the conclusions, welcome or unwelcome. The faith that would forbid us to do so is no faith at all, and would land us in a scepticism as fatal to religion as to science. Let the dissatisfied theologian lay aside his theology and, encouraged by the example of Pius X., direct his attacks on the critical method which yields such inconvenient results.

B.

NAPOLÉON III.'s POLICEMAN.*

THIS famous Chief of Police under Napoleon III. tells us (p. 46) that he was born a policeman as a greyhound is born to course. Elsewhere he describes himself as "a Gil Blas, with a good-natured turn of mind, a man of indefatigable action under a paternal aspect." He it was who brought Tropmann to justice; and had his superiors acted upon the confidential report he submitted to them, he would most likely have foiled the conspiracy of Orsini.

"Once at work," he says again, "I did not possess myself or my object; my object possessed me. It was not till my work was accomplished . . . that I felt fatigue or exhaustion. Once back in ordinary life, my ardour was at an end."

This temperament, no doubt, makes the great policeman, and Monsieur Claude was given ample time to develop and bring to perfection his native qualities. Born in 1807 at Toul (Meurthe), "of an honourable family, though limited in means," he came in 1826 to Paris, and at once began work in the office of an attorney. His post as Chief of Police he resigned in 1876. He thus had a full half century in the service of the law.

During this long career, Claude saw and knew all that could be seen and known in both worlds of Paris, the upper and the under world. While he was copying deeds or carrying files of papers to and fro, the revolution was preparing that brought to an inglorious end the futile and bigoted reign of Charles X. Early in the book a terrible figure hovers for a moment on the scene. In company with some other clerks, Claude was present at a dinner given by a mysterious young man, who, having wasted his substance, had announced his intention of settling down soberly in the law. He was known chiefly as a duellist who had slain his man. The detective's nose of Claude scented in the elegant host an instinctive criminal, and on leaving the restaurant of the Sucking Calf, he said to his friends: "Before long you will hear much about him. He has killed, and he will kill."

The host of the party at the Sucking Calf was Lacenaire, to be elevated by and by into a fearful fame as the most satanic murderer in history. His crimes had not yet begun, but he was shortly afterwards arrested for his

* "Memoirs of Monsieur Claude, Chief of Police under the Second Empire." Translated by Katharine Prescott Wormeley. Constable. 12s. 6d. net.

"A classic of travel."
WANDERINGS IN ARABIA.

By Charles M. Doughty,

Author of "The Dawn in Britain."

With a Portrait and Map, in 2 vols. royal 8vo, 16s. net.

"Mr. Doughty's wonderful book."—Times.

"A masterpiece of English literature."—Daily Mail.

"Is assured of its position in the very front rank of travel books."—Daily Telegraph.

"Unique among narratives of travel."—Daily Chronicle.

"Belongs to the classics of travel literature."—Daily News.

"In many respects the best book of travel ever written."—Punch.

Write for Prospectus.

ADAM CAST FORTH. By CHARLES M. DOUGHTY.

A Sacred Drama in Five Songs, founded on a Judæo-Arabian Legend of Adam and Eve. Crown 8vo. 4s. 6d. net.

[Just published.]

LEGEND AND FOLKLORE OF
 THE HOLY LAND. By J. E. HANAUER. With an

Introduction by MARMADUKE PICKTHALL. Demy 8vo, 8s. net.

"The folk-lore of the Orient is comparatively unknown among Westerners, and this collection of stories, legends, and fables, gathered at first hand, makes an eminently readable volume, and the notes at the end of each chapter are full of interest to a student of folk-lore. The value of the book is enhanced by an interesting introductory chapter by Mr. Pickthall."—Daily News.

STOPFORD BROOKE'S NEW VOLUME.

STUDIES IN POETRY. With a

Photogravure Portrait, crown 8vo, 6s. net.

Essays on Blake, Scott, Keats, Shelley, etc.

[Second Impression.]

THOUGHTS OF LEONARDO DA VINCI AS RECORDED IN HIS NOTE BOOKS.

Edited by EDWARD MCCURDY. Uniform with "The Road-mender." With a Frontispiece, fcap. 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d. net.

"For the thinker there can be no more delightful book."—Daily News.

MUIRHEAD AND GERTRUDE BONE'S NOTABLE WORK.

CHILDREN'S CHILDREN. By

GERTRUDE BONE. Illustrated with upwards of 60 Drawings by MUIRHEAD BONE. Ordinary Edition, 6s. net; Limited Edition on Japanese Vellum (200 copies), 25s. net.

"With its gleams of humour, its gentleness, its reverent pity, it is a very tender study of country life, written by one who must know that life well, and sees it closely linked with the earth that moulds it. The author is fortunate in having for interpreter and commentator (rather than illustrator) Mr. Muirhead Bone. In these sensitive and tender drawings of fields and farms and their inhabitants, the artist takes us far from the towns. Landscapes and figures alike are full of the atmosphere of the story; they catch the very spirit of country places, and of the people, unbecomingly save to the sympathetic eye, whose hearts the author lays open."—Times.

MEMOIRS OF A SURREY LABOURER. By GEORGE BOURNE, Author of "The Bettesworth Book." Crown 8vo, 6s.

This is a book that deals with a real character, and is in no sense fiction. What the author has done is to render a faithful portrait of an old gardener of his who is, to lovers of the country, the most interesting acquaintance that it is possible to meet.

The Spectator says: "He [the author] tells his story simply, in its simple setting of garden sights and sounds, springing crops, cloudy skies, sweltering sunshine; and his picture is of the real English peasant labourer."

THE CRESTED SEAS. By J. B.

CONNOLLY. With 8 Illustrations, crown 8vo, 6s.

"These West Newfoundland tales, humorous, pathetic, stirring, are all redolent of that strange scent that seems to cling to the things of the sea. Perhaps none is more characteristic than the story called 'The Blasphemer,' in which Mr. James Connolly reflects so perfectly the sailor's religious sense—his belief in the supernatural."—Globe.

NEW NOVEL BY THE AUTHOR OF "OLD FIREPROOF."

ISLE RAVEN, a romance. By

OWEN VAUGHAN (Owen Rhoscomyl). Crown 8vo, 6s.

[Just published.]

A NEW WRITER OF DISTINCTION.

RACHEL CHALFONT, a novel.

By SOPHIE COLE. Crown 8vo, 6s.

[Just published.]

"We cannot think that this is a first novel, so mature is it and well planned. The author has looked deep into the mysteries of the human heart, and her portrait of Rachel Chalfont, one of the most subtle and complex characters attempted in recent fiction, is unforgettable. Miss Cole has a sympathy with humanity, an insight into character, an interest in people, and a power of literary expression which should take her far."—Country Life.

DUCKWORTH & CO., Covent Garden, London, W.C.

MESSRS. CONSTABLE'S
ANNOUNCEMENTS—SPRING, 1908.

NEW WORLDS FOR OLD. A Complete Exposition of the modern Socialist idea. By H. G. WELLS. Crown 8vo. 6s.

THE NORTH-WEST PASSAGE. The Record of a Voyage of Exploration of the Ship, "Gjøa," 1903-7. By ROALD AMUNDSEN, with a Supplement by First-Lieut. GODFRED HANSEN. 2 vols. With 139 Illustrations and 3 Maps. 31s. 6d. net.

ICE-BOUND HEIGHTS OF THE MUSTAGH. An Account of Pioneer Exploration and High Climbing in the Baltistan Himalaya. By FANNY BULLOCK WORKMAN and WILLIAM HUNTER WORKMAN, M.A. With 2 Maps, and 170 Illustrations. 21s. net.

THE LATER YEARS OF CATHERINE DE MEDICI. By EDITH SICHEL, Author of "Catherine de Medici and the French Reformation." Illustrated. 15s. net.

MY SCHOOL AND MY GOSPEL. By SIR HUBERT VON HERKOMER, C.V.O. R.A. With 2 Coloured, 4 Photogravure, and over 40 Half-Tone Illustrations. 21s. net.

MEMOIRS OF MONSIEUR CLAUDE, Chief of Police under the Second Empire. Illustrated. 12s. 6d. net.

THE SOUL OF SPAIN. By HAVELOCK ELLIS. Demy 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.

LETTERS FROM THE RAVEN. Correspondence of Lafcadio Hearn. Edited by MILTON BRONNER. 5s. net.

THE SYMBOLIST MOVEMENT IN LITERATURE. By ARTHUR SYMONS. New Edition, Uniform with previous Volumes. 5s. net.

LIFE AND LETTERS OF HIPPOLYTE TAINÉ. Vol. III. (conclusion), 1871-1894. 7s. 6d. net. Previously issued, Vol. I., 1828-1852; Vol. II., 1835-1870.

ROMANTIC TALES FROM THE PANJAB. With Indian Nights Entertainment. Collected by Rev. CHARLES SWYNNERTON. New Edition. 6s. net.

NEW POEMS. By St. JOHN LUCAS. Crown 8vo. 5s. net.

MORNINGS IN THE COLLEGE CHAPEL. Second Series. By Prof. F. G. PEABODY. 5s. net.

AIRSHIPS PAST AND PRESENT. By H. H. HILDEBRANDT, Captain and Instructor in the Prussian Balloon Corps. Fully Illustrated. 10s. 6d. net.

BY THAMES AND COTSWOLD. Sketches of the Country by Rev. W. H. HUTTON. New Edition. With Illustrations by W. M. MEREDITH. 5s. net.

SHROPSHIRE, HEREFORD, AND MONMOUTH. By A. G. BRADLEY. Illustrated by W. M. MEREDITH. Being reissue of Part I. of "March and Borderland of Wales." 5s. net.

UNIFORM WITH THE ABOVE.

GLAMORGAN AND GOWER. By A. G. BRADLEY. Illustrated by W. M. MEREDITH. 3s. 6d. net.

THE BOOK, ITS HISTORY AND DEVELOPMENT.

By CYRIL DAVENPORT, V.D. Illustrated. (Westminster Series). 6s. net.

SIX SHILLING NOVELS.

THE ANCIENT LAW. By ELLEN GLASGOW. Author of "The Deliverance."

THE DAUGHTER. By CONSTANCE SMEDLEY. Author of "Conflict."

THE BURNING CRESSET. By HOWARD PEASE. A Romance of "the 1715" by the Author of "Magnus Sinclair."

A COMEDY OF MOODS. By GREVILLE H. TEMPANY. A Humorous Story by a New Writer.

MAROTZ. By JOHN AYSBOUGH. Author of "Admonition."

 Readers who consider that Prospectuses of any of the above volumes would be of interest are invited to apply for same to—first, a theft in a café. At this point he disappears from Monsieur Claude's pages. The reader will find a competent account of him in Mr. H. B. Irving's "Studies of French Criminals." Lacenaire's sayings in the condemned cell cause a shiver or two. "To kill without remorse is the highest of pleasures." "I kill without passion. Before killing, as after killing, I sleep equally well, and always peacefully." "I kill a man as I drink a glass of wine." After he had been strapped down on the plank of the guillotine, with his head in the lunette, there was a horrible pause. The knife refused to fall. Lacenaire slowly turned his head round in the lunette, and looked up at it. As he gazed on the blade it crashed down upon him.

Archibald Constable & Co. Ltd., 10, Orange St., W.C.

But Lacenaire had unwittingly done a good turn to Claude. The prophetic words of the quill-driver in the lawyer's office reached the ears of the head clerk of the Criminal Court of the Tribunal of the Seine. This official, "perceiving that I might become a very precious employé in his department, made me proposals which I accepted." Thus were opened to its future chief the portals of the Prefecture.

Still, however, he had long to wait. From the position of recording clerk he rose to that of deputy clerk of the Court of the Seine. He was nearly eighteen years in this humble but useful situation (a good clerk is a god-send to a judge, and Claude's procès-verbaux, the written minutes of the facts and proceedings of a case, were much commended), and at last, in 1848, he became a commissary of police. He was commissary at various places, and attached at one time to the section of the theatres. His theatrical reminiscences, like all the rest, are touched off with a vivid, felicitous pen. After the events of June, 1848:—

"I have seen with my own eyes Prince Louis Napoleon Bonaparte, at that very time aspiring to the imperial purple, appear in the box of a theatre with his face and hands dirty, to curry favour with the sovereign people in the gallery.

"I have seen Victor Hugo, standing on one foot, refuse a stool offered him by the malicious Béranger, that he might continue the cynosure of all the eyes of the adoring crowd in the gallery."

He was commissary at Passy when the revolution which disposed of Louis Philippe recalled him to Paris. This was his second experience of Paris in chaos. During the brief revolution of July, 1830, he had acted for a time as the emissary of Thiers, and after that as "improvised secretary" of the provisional government, when he rubbed shoulders with Guizot, Casimir Delavigne, Odillon Barrot, and others—diplomats, financiers, writers, and artists—whom the political tempest had flung together. After 1848, Louis Napoleon is the principal figure in the narrative. Monsieur Claude was no admirer of the Bonapartes, but he found himself "caught in the Napoleonic machinery," and was an active agent of the Coup d'Etat. His account of it is graphic in the extreme: Louis Napoleon receiving his brother conspirators in his private office at the Elysée on the night of December 1st, 1851; handing out decrees with one hand and rolls of money with the other; and then, when they have left him (to swoop down upon the Chamber and the printing offices), smoking his cigar in solitude while he gambles the fate of France, prepared "to cross the frontier or take up his abode in the Tuileries."

But the stars were with Louis Napoleon at this period. It was not the frontier, but the Tuileries. There was to be no other prisoner of Ham; in his stead we behold, in an incredibly short space of time, Napoleon III., Emperor of the French.

Having gained a crown by fraud, he kept it largely by the help of his police. Throughout the Second Empire, France was under police control. There was the private police of the "Château" or Tuileries, and there was the police of the Prefecture, to which Claude belonged. But the police, in truth, were everywhere; "policemen were in the army, in the Press, among the bourgeoisie, as well as among the lowest Parisian classes." They spread through Paris, "a vast crowd of spies, both men and women, whose mission it was to discover the personal enemies of the Empire."

This mission was not always accomplished with complete success. Two thunder-strokes, for instance, which preceded the downfall of the Empire, were Tropmann and Victor Noir. Tropmann's appalling eight-fold murder (the Kinck family, whom he utterly wiped out, were eight in number), has remained in some respects an inexplicable affair, and at the trial of the angelic-faced assassin no proper attempt was made to clear up the mystery. The murder by Prince Pierre Bonaparte, the Emperor's cousin, of the young journalist, Victor Noir (one of Rochefort's reporters on the "Marseillaise"), was near causing a revolution in Paris, and might have caused one had not war against Germany been proclaimed in the very hour of the popular excitement. Yet we have always inclined to the belief—as Monsieur Claude seems to have done—that something in the nature of a trap was set for Prince Pierre on that occasion.

But, notwithstanding that "invisible but indissoluble" chain of police which led from the rookeries of Paris to the Tuileries itself, the shadow of murder was never far from the throne of the third Napoleon. By what miracle did he and his consort emerge with scarce a scratch from the fire-hail of Orsini's bombs at the door of the Opera on that evening of January, 1858? Seventy-six projectiles riddled the iron-plated body of their carriage, and the rain of iron and fire that gushed upon the pavement killed or wounded one hundred and sixty persons.

A brilliant woman, an Italian princess, one of the spies at the Imperial Court, had a hand in this plot. She was a mistress of the Emperor, but that rôle she played merely in furtherance of the ulterior design. For she was also, and in far truer and deeper kind, the mistress of Orsini himself. The scheme was in a measure organised in and directed from London, by a committee of which Ledru-Rollin was president; but the arch-destroyer, a descendant of that great family of the Orsini who had given cardinals and popes to the Church, sought to take everything on himself, and to shield and save his accomplices. A fanatic of the exalted, inflexible, and inexorable type, he pursued Napoleon as the enemy or false friend of Italy. On the scaffold, barefooted and swathed in the black veil of the parricide, he showed no tremor. The whole band in this affair were more or less of the Mazzinian group, but Mazzini had no part in the plot.

As Lacenaire had opened for Monsieur Claude the door of the Prefecture, so did Orsini uplift him there to the dignity of Chief of Police. That "Madame X—" who glides through all the annals of the Second Empire had warned him of Orsini and his bombs. The people above him slighted his report. When the Emperor saw it, too late for action, he gave an instant order that the right man should be installed in the right office.

There we must leave him. We have, however, in no wise exhausted his fascinating memoirs. He has much to tell of the Press of the Second Empire (gagged, suppressed, or befooled from first to last); of the gamblers and gambling-houses; of the thieves and forgers; of the rogues, rakes, cads, and adventurers of whom the inimitable Labiche made such inimitable use in the comedies and farces that fill his ten delicious volumes. And, towards the close of the book, what a picture is that of the old sleuth-hound, Claude himself, in charge of the Imperial baggage-train during the first days of the Franco-German war: the train that carried, together with the pots and pans and bedding, the coaches of state in which Napoleon III. was to make his entry into Berlin!

Of the adaptation into English—five volumes of Claude's original condensed into one—we shall but say that it well sustains Miss Wormeley's reputation as one of the best and most artistic translators at present interpreting the mind of France.

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

THE aim of Mr. Ellsworth Huntington's book, "The Pulse of Asia" (Constable, 14s. net), is "to illustrate the geographic relation between physical environment and man, and between changes of climate and history." The author brings forward the theory—which is not so new as he seems to believe—that climatic changes have been one of the greatest factors in determining the course of human progress, and in support of this theory lays great stress upon the evidence he adduces in favour of the view, already held but without much scientific confirmation, that parts of Asia have been growing drier. It cannot, of course, be denied

MR. MURRAY'S NEW BOOKS.

A CRITICAL EXAMINATION OF SOCIALISM.

By W. H. MALLOCK. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"Mr. Mallock's brilliant critical examination." The Times.

"The keenly analytical intellect of Mr. W. H. Mallock, his rare gifts as a logician, and the lucidity and incisiveness of his controversial methods, have never been employed with happier or more valuable results than in 'A Critical Examination of Socialism.' . . . Mr. Mallock's examination of Socialist false principles and fallacious assumptions is too far-reaching to be even summarised here. But we believe that by this book he has done more than any other philosophical opponent of the 'collectivist' heresy to bring home its mischievous utility to the minds of all thinking persons."—The World.

"By far the closest criticism that has appeared in the English language this book marks a considerable advance in subtlety of reasoning upon his two earlier works which entered the same ground of controversy . . . It is the best current statement of the essential features of the anti-socialistic position."—The Nation.

"We have not met with a more able statement of the points at issue, and everyone should read the book, whether he is an opponent or a defender of Socialistic theories. By this book Mr. Mallock resumes the position he held twenty years ago as one of the shrewdest thinkers and most lucid writers in our midst."—Sheffield Independent.

THE REMINISCENCES OF THE LATE ALBERT PELL,

Sometime M.P. for South Leicestershire. Edited, with a Memoir, by THOMAS MACKAY, Editor of the "Life of Samuel Smiles," &c. With an Appreciation by the Right Hon. JAMES BRYCE. With Portraits and other Illustrations, demy 8vo, 15s. net.

"It is evident he wrote with knowledge and from conviction. There are in the book many evidences of the remarkable changes Mr. Pell witnessed during his career, and numerous good stories of his own and of other people. . . . Gives an admirable idea of the attractive personality met with in this autobiography."—Scotsman.

NEW VOLUME IN THE PROGRESSIVE SCIENCE SERIES.
HEREDITY.

By J. ARTHUR THOMSON, Regius Professor of Natural History in the University of Aberdeen. With numerous Illustrations. Large Crown 8vo, 9s. net.

Professor J. Arthur Thomson's comprehensive and long-looked for work on Heredity will be published next Wednesday. It is the latest word on the subject, and expounds the results which have been reached through the researches of Mendel, Galton, Weissmann, Pearson, Bateson, De Vries and others. The author deals fully with such questions as heredity and sex, the physical basis and common modes of inheritance, transmission of acquired characters, heredity and disease. The volume, which is well illustrated and contains coloured diagrams, will be found an up-to-date reliable statement of the biological facts of Heredity.

TWO NEW 6/- NOVELS.
GRAHAM OF CLAVERHOUSE.
IAN MACLAREN'S LAST WORK.

"Some critics have suggested that this book is too much of a biography and too little of a novel. In our view it is the tenderest, saddest, and most beautiful of Ian MacLaren's latter books."—British Weekly.

"An excellent story, equal to any work of the lamented author."—Athenæum.

"A fine study of the man, really biographical, though in the form of fiction."—Spectator.

"This novel will surely be accounted one of his best. It is a stirring, splendidly told tale. It is a grand historical novel. . . . Is likely to rank as one of Ian MacLaren's greatest successes."—Daily Telegraph.

"A historical novel into which Ian MacLaren put his very soul. This is Ian MacLaren's triumph."—Liverpool Post.

MOTHERS IN ISRAEL.

By J. S. FLETCHER, Author of "Daniel Quayne," "The Ivory God," &c.

" . . . as for the 'Mothers in Israel' words fail to indicate with what charm and with what a sense of actuality and of conviction they are placed before us."—Liverpool Daily Post.

"'Mothers in Israel' is without equal. It has all that a Yorkshire story should have—breath, humour, strength, and heartiness, and it can be recommended cordially."—Yorkshire Daily Post.

"This story is quite one of the most masterly that Mr. Fletcher has yet given us."—Daily News.

JOHN MURRAY, Albemarle Street, W.

BERTRAM DOBELL'S PUBLICATIONS.

Crown 8vo, pp. 404, cloth extra, 5s. net.

LETTERS FROM PERCY BYSSHE SHELLEY TO ELIZABETH HITCHENER.

Now first published.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

THE POETICAL WORKS OF THOMAS TRAHERNE.

"Let all lovers of good poetry rejoice with Mr. Dobell, for he has rescued a poet out of the dust, and advanced him to a deserved place beside two such men as Herbert and Vaughan."—MR. QUILLER-ROUCH in the Daily News.

Small 4to, cloth extra, 7s. 6d. net.

THE WORKS, POETIC AND DRAMATIC,
OF WILLIAM STRODE (1600-1645).

Now first collected from Manuscript and Printed Sources. With an Introduction and Notes.

B. DOBELL, 77, Charing Cross Road, W.C.

CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY PRESS

SLAVONIC EUROPE. A Political History of Poland and Russia from 1447 to 1796. By R. NISBET BAIN.

"Mr. R. Nisbet Bain has given us a book which was long wanted. Much of the history of Eastern Europe is still unexplored; and we cannot give Mr. Bain's work higher praise than to say that out of the tangle he has produced a singularly compact, clear, and well-proportioned history that ought to be a safe and welcome guide to thousands of readers."—Spectator.

A LIFE OF GILBERT BURNET, Bishop of Salisbury. I. Scotland, 1643-1674. By T. E. S.

CLARKE, B.D. II. England, 1674-1715, with Bibliographical Appendices. By H. C. FOXCROFT, Editor of "A Supplement to Burnet's History of His Own Time." With an Introduction by Professor C. H. FIRTH, M.A.

"The story of the formative part of Burnet's Life is told, and told well, by the Rev. T. E. S. Clarke, the present minister of Saltoun. . . . Miss Foxcroft's work will be not only popular among serious students of the man and his time, but also probably final. . . . Any account of this notable book would be incomplete without reference to the Introduction by the master-hand of Prof. Firth, in which Burnet's place, not as a moralist or a divine or a politician, but as an historian, is elaborately and conclusively discussed. There is no side of this part of the subject which is not treated with fullness and with his usual lucidity."—Athenæum.

Royal 8vo,
15s. net.

DECADENCE. By the Right Hon. A. J. BALFOUR,

M.P., being the Henry Sidgwick Memorial Lecture delivered at Newnham College, Cambridge, January 25th, 1908.

"The decadence which the author discusses in this lecture 'is the decadence which attacks, or is alleged to attack, great communities and historic civilisations, which is to societies of men what senility is to man, and is often, like senility, the precursor and the cause of final dissolution.'"

Crown 8vo,
1s. 6d. net.

A BOOK OF GREEK VERSE. By WALTER

HEADLAM, Litt.D., Fellow of King's College.

"Many of Dr. Headlam's renderings approach perfection in diction and rhythm, and are inspired by a feeling for poetry which is as rare as it is delightful. The Greek versions we have no space to review in detail, and can only record our belief that they are not surpassed, if indeed they are equalled by any existing productions of the same kind."—Athenæum.

CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY PRESS WAREHOUSE,
Fetter-lane, London. C. F. Clay, Manager.

NOW READY. Price 1/- March. No. 29

OUR UNJUST TAXATION AND ITS REMEDY,

An Open Letter to the Chancellor of the Exchequer,
By HENRY LOWENFELD.

OUR UNJUST TAXATION AND ITS REMEDY.

Other Important Articles by Percy Martin, F.R.G.S.,
Dr. Ferdinando Piccinelli, &c.

OUR UNJUST TAXATION AND ITS REMEDY.

SEE

THE FINANCIAL REVIEW OF REVIEWS.

To be obtained at all Bookstalls and Booksellers throughout the United Kingdom, or of the Publishers:—

2, WATERLOO PLACE, LONDON, S.W.

BOOKS OF LIBERAL RELIGION.
People's Editions, 6d. each net.

Endeavours after the Christian Life.

First and Second Series. (2 vols.) By JAMES MARTINEAU, LL.D., D.C.L., D.D.

The Perfect Life.

Twelve Discourses. By WILLIAM ELLERY CHANNING, D.D.

Materialism and Atheism Examined.

By JAMES FREEMAN CLARKE, D.D. With an Introduction by SYDNEY H. MELLONE, M.A., D.Sc.

The Religious Ideas.

By WILLIAM JOHNSON FOX, M.P. With a Brief Sketch of his Life.

God and the Soul: Fundamental Religion.

By RICHARD A. ARMSTRONG, B.A.

The First Three Gospels: Their Origin and Relations.

With a new chapter on the Historical Value of the Gospels. By J. ESTLIN CARPENTER, M.A., D.Litt.

The Passing and the Permanent in Religion.

By MINOT J. SAVAGE, D.D.

The Reformation of the Sixteenth Century in its Relation to Modern Thought and Knowledge.

By CHARLES BEARD, B.A., LL.D.

The Soul, its Sorrows and its Aspirations.

By FRANCIS WILLIAM NEWMAN. With Memoir and Introduction by CHARLES B. UPTON, B.A.

PHILIP GREEN, 5, Essex Street, Strand, W.C., and all Booksellers that a marked change in climate bringing with it great agricultural depression is bound to exercise an influence upon countries far beyond the region where the change takes place owing to the fact that the inhabitants of the country affected are likely to overrun all the surrounding districts in search of food. But Mr. Huntington scarcely writes with that regard for verifiable fact which we expect from a man of science. As an example we may quote his statement following Professor Lowell's almost unsupported view that it is "the dry climate of Mars which has caused the inhabitants of that planet to adopt an advanced form of social organisation, where war is unknown, and each man must be keenly conscious of the interdependence of himself and the universal state." The best parts of the book are those in which Mr. Huntington narrates his own travels through Chinese Turkestan from India to Siberia. There are a large number of highly interesting reproductions from photographs taken by the author.

* * *

"I AM one of those," says Mr. Arthur Symons in the dedication of his "Cities of Italy" (Dent, 4s. 6d. net), "for whom the visible world exists, very actively; and, for me, cities are like people, with souls and temperaments of their own, and it has always been one of my chief pleasures to associate with the souls and temperaments congenial to me among cities." Although he goes on to say that he has tried to put as little of himself as possible into his pages, the reader soon discovers that the book narrates the adventures of Mr. Symons's soul among the temperaments of the cities which he has found most congenial to his own. The result is a singularly attractive book, written in the sensitive and artificial prose of which Mr. Symons is a master. One of the best chapters in the book is the opening one, on Rome, a city he happily describes as "a sea in which many worlds have gone down, and its very pavement is all in waves," which, beginning by being "colossally simple," is yet the "most pompous, the most magnificent of Western cities." Venice, too, gives occasion for some fine word-painting, but Naples, with its "uncouth violence of life" and "ferment of uncivilisation," repels him, and Pompeii, "the Brighton of its day," with the "conventional glibness of its decorative paintings," only oppresses him. Part of the book is taken from the Italian section of "Cities," published in 1903, and Mr. Symons intends dealing, in a later volume, with the cities of Spain.

* * *

In a preface to "Ireland and the Home Rule Movement" by Mr. Michael F. J. McDonnell (Maunsell & Co., 1s. net), Mr. John Redmond recommends the book as a thoughtful, well-informed, and scholarly study of several of the more important features of the Irish question. Mr. McDonnell's tone is studiously moderate. He lets the facts speak for themselves and though many statements in the chapter on the financial relations between England and Ireland may seem exaggerated to readers in this country, Mr. McDonnell brings evidence in support of his contentions which ought to convince unprejudiced minds. The discussion of the economic condition of Ireland is admirable and the author points out the burden of taxation under which the country labours, more than seven and a-half millions being spent on the Executive alone, although, as Sir Robert Giffen calculated, the incomes of the wage-earning classes are man for man only one-half those of the members of the same classes in England. Other chapters deal in excellent fashion with the land question, the religious and educational problems, Irish Unionism, and Ireland and Great Britain. The book can be heartily commended to those who wish to read a moderate statement of Irish grievances and the chief grounds of her claim to self-government.

* * *

"UNDER NORTH STAR AND SOUTHERN CROSS," by Mr. Francis Sinclair (Sampson Low, Marston & Co., 6s. net), consists of seven stories, the titles of which sufficiently indicate their character. Mr. Sinclair is a traveller, possessed of much knowledge and some imagination. In "The Haunted Ship" and "The Marooned Maiden's Secret" we have mystery and romance in settings of the Antarctic and the South Pacific Islands; "Faithful unto Death: An Adventure in the Far North" takes us to the other end of the world; and we are once more transported, this time to the Nearer East, by "The Lost Oasis of El Darag" and "The History of the Knight, Sir Conrad Delamere." Besides these there are "Margarita of Grizzly Canyon," a tale of Spanish-American love and revenge, and "Irene Middleton: A Study in Psychology." In spite of their penny-dreadful titles, the first three stories are the most powerful of the collection, not so much on account of plot and characterisation as for their vivid local colouring and atmosphere. We are not sure that the author's device of running one story into another in the manner of the "Arabian Nights" is entirely happy. The narrative style, also, which he adopts from the same classic becomes at times a trifle stilted and tiresome, and the dialogue yields banalities by the score. Yet the scenic descriptions are vivid enough, and the volume should at least cause no disappointment to admirers of Mr. Sinclair's previous one, "Where the Sun Sets."

* * *

MESSRS. KEGAN PAUL have done well to make Mgr. Duchesne's "The Beginnings of the Temporal Sovereignty of the Popes" (7s. 6d.) accessible to English readers. But the best translation in the world—and Mr. Arnold Mathew's is as good as we can get—can never reproduce the extraordinary distinction and fascination of Mgr. Duchesne's French. Still, the loss is far less in the case of so severely positive and historical a work as the present, which leaves little room for the play of lighter moods. The author is, before all, a critical historian—we will not say a "modernist," for his book is sealed with an Imprimatur—and what he gives us is the critical, as opposed to the legendary, account of the origin of the Pope's Temporal Power. It seems that Roman Catholics are still permitted to doubt the story of the Donation of Constantine. At all events, there is no room for it in Mgr. Duchesne's history, which traces, step by step, the series of confluent events, all very natural and prosaic, which led up to that most mixed blessing—the papal sovereignty. If unpleasant truths have to be told, they are told here with all the cold objectivity which history requires and without the slightest disposition either to shock by candour or to edify by dissimulation. The interest, the method, the results, are purely scientific. Why then the Imprimatur? Why is a Doctor of Theology, and not rather a Doctor of History, asked to say Nihil obstat? By an admirable and exhaustive index Miss Annette Calthrop has deprived the reviewer of one of his commonest grumbles in regard to such books of reference; and Mr. Mathew's translation is that of a well-practised hand.

* * *

BIBLIOMANIA is defined in the dictionaries as a rage for possessing rare or curious books. The disease takes many forms, but a symptom of one clearly marked variety is to regard books as "pleasant to the eye" rather than as "things to be desired to make one wise." Even the most hardened reader will sympathise to some extent with this attitude if he turns over the pages of "Early Woodcut Initials," selected and annotated by Dr. Oscar Jennings (Methuen, 21s. net). It contains reproductions of more than thirteen hundred ornamental letters of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, many of them of great beauty. Dr. Jennings traces the history of ornamentation from the early block-books, of which the Mayence Psalter is, perhaps, the finest specimen down through the various schools of printing—Augsburg, Ulm and Nuremberg, Basle and Zurich, Cologne and Geneva, Venice, Lyons, Paris, &c., ending with a chapter on English Initials. Dr. Jennings has little praise for English ornamental letters. Some, he says, "are almost incredibly bad, others merely wooden, a very few, like the cut to Fisher's funeral sermon for Henry VII., fairly neat." The letters reproduced bear out the statement that "English printers could enlist the services of no designers of any skill and of few wood-cutters able to rival the average journeyman in foreign books."

* * *

In view of the organised attack intended by our Government upon the sweating system in this country, particular value attaches to the portion of Miss Violet Markham's book, "The Factory and Shop Acts of the British Dominions" (Eyre & Spottiswoode, 2s. 6d. net), which sets forth what has been done in New Zealand and Australia, where humane and enlightened legislators have been able to scotch sweating in its beginnings.

Mr. HEINEMANN'S NEW BOOKS.

MEMORIES OF EIGHT PARLIAMENTS.

By HENRY W. LUCY.

With Portrait, 1 vol. demy 8vo, 8s. 6d. net.*

"Sometimes the picture is descriptive, sometimes critical, but in all cases both pregnant and suggestive."
—DAILY TELEGRAPH.

RECORDS OF STIRRING TIMES.

Based upon Unpublished Documents from 1726-1822.

By the Authoress of "Old Days in Diplomacy."

Edited by M. MONTGOMERY CAMPBELL. Illustrated,
1 vol. demy 8vo, 10s. net.* [March 13th.

. These letters emanate from various well-known personages in the inner circle of Court and Political life and cover a period of nearly 100 years. They include Letters from the family of George III., in which the general reader will find plenty of amusement and the student much of historical value.

MEMOIRS OF THE COMTESSE DE BOIGNE.

The THIRD Volume (1820-1830), completing the Work, is now ready. Demy 8vo, 10s. net.*

"The second and third volumes are even more interesting than the first. The excellent translation will introduce these to a large number of readers."—Spectator.

Uniform with the above, 10s. net each:

Vol. I, (1781-1814) and Vol. II, (1815-1819).

NEW SIX-SHILLING NOVELS.

A NEW NOVEL by Miss ELIZABETH ROBINS.

COME AND FIND ME.

By ELIZABETH ROBINS,

Author of "The Magnetic North."

"Keeps one enthralled. A remarkable book, full of life and wonder; a book that to read is a liberal education."—MORNING POST.

A THIRD LARGE IMPRESSION IS NOW READY OF MR. DE MORGAN'S NEW NOVEL.

SOMEHOW GOOD.

By WILLIAM DE MORGAN,

Author of "Joseph Vance" and "Alice-for-Short."

"Mr. De Morgan is becoming a national institution. We cannot do without him. He invites you to his comfortably furnished novel for a week-end among the most conversable entertaining people, and you accept and are enchanted. You would be an idiot if you did not."—Times.

A SECOND LARGE IMPRESSION IS NOW READY OF

THE PULSE OF LIFE.

By Mrs. BELLOC-LOWNDES, Author of "Barbara Rebell," &c.

"Mrs. Belloc-Lowndes has a distinction of mind and of style which sets her far apart from and far above the ordinary novel-writer. It is difficult to put the book down till it is finished."—Westminster Gazette.

WHITE ROSE OF WEARY LEAF.

By VIOLET HUNT.

"An extraordinary novel. It is certain to achieve a remarkable popularity and vogue. It is crowded with real people, and pulsates with real perplexities and passion."—Standard.

SHEAVES. [3rd Impression.

By E. F. BENSON, Author of "The House of Defence," &c.

"Mr. Benson has never done anything better."—Truth.

THE HISTORY OF AYTHAN WARING.

By VIOLET JACOB, Author of "The Sheepstealers."

"A supremely good novel."—Pall Mall Gazette.

THE NIGHT THAT BRINGS OUT STARS.

By GEORGETTE AGNEW.

THE ISLAND PHARISEES.

By JOHN GALSWORTHY, Author of "The Man of Property," &c. [New Edition entirely re-written.

* Prospectus on Application.

WM. HEINEMANN, 21, Bedford Street, W.C.

Messrs. DENTS' Books.

ST. CATHERINE OF SIENA.

By EDMUND G. GARDNER.

With an Appendix containing some hitherto UNPUBLISHED LETTERS of St. Catherine. Illustrated in Photogravure.

16s. NET.

Daily News.—"Mr. Gardner has produced an exceedingly interesting life of one of the remarkable women of the world. Incidentally he has given an extraordinarily vivid picture of the later days of the fourteenth century in Europe, when the great civilisation of the Middle Ages was tottering to its fall. It is a book of research, of sincere and elaborate historical study, embodying much matter hitherto unexamined, from the museums and libraries of Italy, and many of Catherine's letters hitherto unpublished. And the whole is fused and blended with an ability of selection and power of narrative which makes the story a work of art as well as a product of research, exceedingly pleasant reading."

CITIES OF ITALY.

By ARTHUR SYMONS. Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net.

"The author has many gifts which give his essays distinction and charm."—Daily Telegraph.

"Mr. Symons is always picturesque, and his book is a delightful record of pleasant hours in a sunny land."—Manchester Guardian.

THE OLD VENETIAN PALACES

AND OLD VENETIAN FOLK. By THOMAS

OKEY. 50 Illustrations in Colour and many in Line by TREVOR HADDON, R.B.A., and several Reproductions from the Works of JOHN RUSKIN. 4to cloth, £1 1s. net.

[Prospectus post free.

"A volume of quite exceptional charm and interest. . . . Mr. Haddon's illustrations are very beautiful; he has caught the true inwardness of Venetian scenery. . . . Certainly a book to possess."—Guardian.

"A sumptuous book. . . . There could hardly be a finer gift for the art lover."—Globe.

"A very thorough study . . . a learned volume. It is also a human one."—Standard.

THE OLD SILVER SACRAMENTAL VESSELS OF FOREIGN

PROTESTANT CHURCHES IN ENGLAND. By E. ALFRED

JONES, author of "A Catalogue of the Royal Plate at Windsor Castle," "Old English Gold Plate," &c. Illustrated by 4 Photogravures and 18 Half-Tone Illustrations. Royal 4to, £1 1s. net.

"Some admirably produced illustrations of seventeenth and eighteenth century examples adorn this attractive book."—Westminster Gazette.

JAMES FRANCIS EDWARD, the old Chevalier. By

MARTIN HAILE, author of "Mary of Modena, Queen of James II." Illustrated in Photogravure. 16s. net.

"We are privileged to read in this book for the first time much that has hitherto been unpublished. . . . This book is worthy of the closest attention."—Daily News.

"Mr. Haile is to be cordially congratulated. His monograph, beautifully produced and illustrated, represents an honest, painstaking, and distinguished piece of work. . . . In the future, whenever Stuart and Orange periods are under consideration, Mr. Haile's estimate will have to be reckoned with. . . . His well-written and picturesque study will be read and discussed by those responsible for a just view of history for years to come."—Daily Telegraph.

This volume forms a sequel to the same author's "MARY OF MODENA, QUEEN OF JAMES II."

Two Interesting Biographies:

SIR GEORGE GREY:

Pioneer of Empire in Southern Lands. By Prof. G. C. HENDERSON, M.A., of Adelaide University. With numerous Portraits, Illustrations and Maps, cloth, 12s. 6d. net. [Prospectus post free.

"A remarkable book about a remarkable man."—Daily News.

"A valuable contribution to the history of the British Empire."—Athenaeum.

"Professor Henderson's remarkably able study of a distinguished man might serve as a model to future biographies."—Daily Telegraph.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

By HENRY BRYAN BINNS. Author of "A Life of Walt Whitman." With many Portraits and other Illustrations, crown 8vo, cloth, 4s. 6d. net.

(New Volume in the "Temple Biographies.")

"A careful and interesting study of President Lincoln. He tells us more than the ordinary biographer of the intimate personal life."—Westminster Gazette.

"An excellent piece of work, telling with sympathy, with restraint, and often with a fine insight, one of the most romantic of life-stories."—Daily News.

J. M. DENT & Co., Aldine House, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.

The writer has probably been wise in confining her hand-book to a statement of legislative facts without attempting to discuss the merits of the several measures and the degree of success that is attached to them. Apart from the importance of the experiments in Wages Boards and State arbitration, no reader can fail to be struck by the boldness of these new States in asserting governmental control over wages and hours of labour, not only of children and of women, but of adult males. Though the industrial conditions in Great Britain and these new Colonies are so widely different in some respects, it is generally agreed that we have something to learn, both from the more courageous attitude of these advanced States towards private industry and freedom of contract and from the detailed experiments, the conditions of which are here set forth. The industrial Sub-Committee of the Victoria League is to be congratulated upon its part in the publication of this excellent and serviceable little work.

* * *

"WINDSOR" (Black, 7s. 6d. net) has been painted very daintily by Mr. G. M. Henton in the latest volume of a well-known colour series. Certain of the drawings appear to have been done from photographs, but they are in no case slavish copies; and the suggestion of gentle sunshine and delicately atmospheric skies, which happily are no longer strangers to process work, are anything but mechanical. There is a distinction to be observed between the pictures and the letterpress. The former take the town of Windsor for their subject, while the latter, which is written by Sir Richard R. Holmes, is practically confined to the history of Windsor Castle. It may be that the history of the Castle is virtually that of the town; at any rate, it is very largely so. Sir Richard's record is a quite unvarnished one. He traces the Castle's history, dynasty by dynasty, starting with its beginnings under Henry II., and continuing to the present time, describing the structural alterations that have taken place and recalling its many historical and literary associations. A narrative of things connected with Windsor, bringing to memory not merely kings and queens, splendid fanes and sumptuous piles, but also Froissart, Foxe, and Shakespeare, this handy book of the Royal Borough should not lack patronage.

* * *

A REVISED edition of Mr. E. H. Lacon Watson's "Benedictine" has been issued by Messrs. Brown, Langham & Co. (1s. net). It contains a number of pleasant sketches of married life with occasional excursions into other topics supposed to be written by a newly married man of letters. The humour is not forced and the style is easy with a certain note of distinction. The best of the essays seem to us those on "Book Catalogues" and "Pedestrian Reflections."

The Week in the City.

ALTHOUGH business has been very light on the Stock Exchange during the week, a certain cheerfulness was imparted to the City by the reduction of the Bank Rate on Thursday to $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. Some high authorities were surprised and not overpleased; for the situation in Berlin, where a 6 per cent. bank rate still rules, is disquieting. There have been a good many failures lately, one especially of a big firm in Chile which has been ruined by nitrates; and these things affect London. However, the open discount rate was weak and mercantile feeling in the City was strong for a reduction. New issues are coming out fast, and will be stimulated by the ease in the money market. But there is much doubt whether the supply of investment money will be equal to the demand. City men say that the Chartered Company's ingenious attempt to attract capital from Chartered shareholders will be a failure. They say: Why should we exercise the option when we can buy the shares now in the market at thirteen shillings?

JAPANESE DEPRESSION.

That there is a genuine business depression in Japan is not surprising considering that a great part of the Japanese export trade is to the United States. The heavy fall in raw silk and copper has ruined many of the speculative merchants and some small banks have collapsed. Then again, investors do not like the high rate of taxation, and the enormously increased level of military and naval expenditure since the war. The recent retrenchments have barely balanced income and expenditure in the Budget. Hence, Japanese bonds are on the down grade despite Government support, which is skilfully injected by a well-known City broker. Additional anxiety has been caused by the friction with China; for it is felt that Japan cannot afford another war, successful or unsuccessful, with anybody. However, I am inclined to think that so far as public finance is concerned the situation will gradually improve. Investors may take note of the following statement which I have just received from Japan as to the naval and military retrenchments already sanctioned by the Government. A yen, I should mention, is equivalent to two shillings:—

The cost of the construction of new barracks, with other expenditure for the army, is reduced from 34,567,534 yen, to 31,794,541 yen, the total reduction up to 1910-11 being estimated at 12,581,832 yen. Then the sum which was to be set aside for the restoration of the Army to its state of efficiency before the war (2,000,329 yen) is to be reduced to 1,700,329 yen, thus effecting a saving up to the fiscal year 1910-11 of 25,191,158 yen. The naval estimates—the cost of construction of warships and naval buildings—are to be reduced from 11,887,132 yen to 8,173,682 yen, saving the substantial sum of 45,811,438 yen up to 1910-11. The expenditure for the maintenance of the fleet is also to be reduced, from 13,818,978 yen to 12,564,457 yen, the total saving in this department being estimated at 8,013,820 yen up to 1910-11. The total amount prescribed for the coming fiscal year for works, the completion of which covers a series of years, was 72,204,608 yen, of which it is now proposed to effect a temporary saving of 11,771,597 yen. The total reduction, by means of postponement, of the projected works up to 1912-13 amounts to 103,923,122 yen.

NEW YORK CITY BONDS.

Many inquiries are being made just now for safe and profitable investments, and from some points of view the moment seems favourable, as money is almost certain to be easy in a short time. Nevertheless, seeing that the Governments of the world are plunging into deficits, and that railways and industrial concerns in the United States, Canada, and many other countries are clamouring for capital, I think it is quite arguable that the average rate of interest on long investments is quite as likely to rise as to fall during the year. Assuming, however, that it is desirable to invest money just now, I think there is something to be said for the New York City bonds, of which over fifty million dollars' worth were sold in New York in the middle of last month. The city is very extravagant, and its finances are badly, if not corruptly, managed. The debt has been increasing of late years very rapidly. Still, it is too big a city to go, like Winnipeg, into the hands of a receiver. The Government will almost certainly interfere rather than allow such a blow to be struck at American credit.

AMERICAN RAILROAD RECEIVERSHIPS.

Apropos of the appointment of a receiver for a small Louisville line, a leading American financial critic draws attention to the weak position of other railroads, "notably M. O. P., Erie, Rock Island, Southern Railway, Atlantic Coast Line, and St. Louis South-Western." He adds: "The securities of these roads have all suffered of late; and unless there is a revival in business, the final outcome may not be pleasant." There is no sign at present of a revival in business in America or anywhere else. Gould properties have been specially unpopular in Wall Street; so much so that "Goulditis" has become a synonym for "dry rot." Missouri Pacific has been especially affected by liquidation.

LEVER BROTHERS.

A piquant interest attaches to the report of this great soap concern, which was published on Thursday. The profit and loss balance is £405,331, "after crediting £50,000 cash received in an action for libel"—and this is the only reference to Mr. Lever's successful libel action. Of the profits, £32,246 goes to the "prosperity sharing" account. After paying an Ordinary dividend at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum, £4,554 is passed to reserve.

LUCELLUM.

"PYRENO"

(REGISTERED)

A PERFECT UNDERWEAR

Should any Garment shrink in the wash it
WILL BE REPLACED.

BIRKBECK BANK

ESTABLISHED 1851.

SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, HIGH HOLBORN, W.C.

2½ per cent. INTEREST allowed on Deposit Accounts.

2 per cent. INTEREST

on Drawing Accounts with Cheque Book.

All General Banking Business transacted.

ALMANACK, with full particulars, POST FREE.

C. F. RAVENSCROFT, Secretary.

THE BOOK MONTHLY

NOW ON SALE.

The March "BOOK MONTHLY,"
6d. net., beautifully illustrated, having bright literary gossip, informed special articles, and full information of the books just published and about to be published.

If you are interested in books you should get this dainty magazine regularly; and certainly you should write for a specimen copy to the Publishers, SIMPKIN
MARSHALL & CO., Stationers' Hall Court, London
who will send one free.

Waterman's Ideal Fountain Pen

City Life

Every man who leads a busy life finds more work to do than time in which to do it.
There are three courses open to him: he can refuse the work, lengthen his business hours, or more efficiently equip himself to cope with it. Waterman's Ideal cannot lengthen any hour, but it can make every writing hour more productive. It is the ideal writing equipment for every man and woman whose time is of value and whose comfort is a matter of consideration.

Prices: 10/6, 15/6, 17/6, 21/6, and upwards. In Silver and Gold for presentation. Of Stationers, Jewellers, etc. Booklet post-free from

L. & C. HARDTMUTH,
12, Golden Lane, London, E.C.
(New York: 173 Broadway.)

F.E.P.

Suction Gas Power.

80% REDUCTION

OF YOUR

GAS ENGINE

GAS BILL.

TANGYES Ltd., Birmingham.

BOVRIL IS ALL BEEF

—as pure as it is good.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

KINGSLEY HOTEL, Near the British Museum.
Hart Street, Bloomsbury Square, London.
THACKERAY HOTEL,
Opposite the British Museum.
Great Russell Street, London.

These well-appointed and commodious Temperance Hotels will, it is believed, meet the requirements, at moderate charges, of those who desire all the conveniences and advantages of the larger modern Licensed Hotels. These Hotels have Passenger Lifts, Electric Light throughout, Bathrooms on every floor, spacious Dining, Drawing, Writing, Reading, Billiard, and Smoking Rooms, heated throughout. Fireproof Floors. Perfect Sanitation. Telephones. Night Porters.

BEDROOMS (including attendance) from 3/6 to 6/0.

Inclusive charge for Bedroom, Attendance, Table d'Hôte, Breakfast and Dinner, From 8/6 to 10/6 per day.

Full Tariff and Testimonials on application.

Telegraphic Addresses—

Kingsley Hotel, "Bookcraft, London." Thackeray Hotel, "Thackeray, London."

FOREIGN HOTELS.

WIESBADEN.

HOTEL NASSAU. With fine Bathing Establishment. Situated at the Curplace. "The English Home."

ST. MORITZ, ENGADINE.

THE BELVEDERE. High-class English Family Hotel, in the finest and sunniest position. Inclusive terms 11 to 20 francs.

BOOKSELLERS.

Our Offer THE S.S. WORKER'S BIBLE

6/-

for 3/6

Containing a selection of the best Aids to Bible Study, most suitable for a Young Teacher or Elder Scholar. Good, clear type, portable size. Size, 5½ by 4½ by 1½ inches, with references, concordance, atlas, illustrations of antiquities, etc. Handsomely bound in limp Morocco, overlapping edges, round corners, red under gold edges, elastic band. Each Bible in box. This Bible can be had with new thumb index on edge, at 1s. extra.

Postage 4d.

Abroad 8d. THE LONDON BIBLE WAREHOUSE,
53, Paternoster Row, E.C.

BOOKS. Ancient and Modern, Bought, Sold and Exchanged.

THOMAS THORP, 100, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.
(And at READING.)

MONTHLY CATALOGUES FREE.

Mr. Thorp has incorporated the business in Review Books carried on for many years by Mrs. Hindley at Booksellers' Row, and at the above address.

J. POOLE & CO., 104, Charing Cross Road, LONDON.

School, Classical, Mathematical, Scientific, and Students'

BOOKSELLERS.

NEW AND SECOND-HAND.

All enquiries as to Prices of Books in our VERY LARGE STOCK answered.

UNITARIANISM and THE NEW THEOLOGY.

EXPLANATORY PAMPHLETS SENT POST FREE.

UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION,

ESSEX HALL, ESSEX STREET, STRAND, W.C.

ARTICLES FOR SALE.

ARUNDEL CHROMOS.

LARGE number in Stock. Many rare ones. Send stamp for this month's list (giving size and shape of each).—Saint Jude's Dépôt, Birmingham.

ANNUAL REPORTS ECCLESIASTICAL COMMISSIONERS, 1847-1904, 31 Vols., handsomely bound in half-calf; perfect condition; what offers?—T. P. Newbould, Broadway Chambers, Ilford, Essex.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

LONDON.

WILD'S TEMPERANCE HOTELS. J. B. Wild, C.C., Man. Direc. 30-40, Ludgate Hill, E.C.; 70 & 71, Euston Square, W.C.

AT BOURNEMOUTH HYDRO.

IDEAL RESIDENCE.

Sun Lounge. Every form of Bath.

BOURNEMOUTH.

THE QUEEN, Bath Road.

Miss Tye.

Central. Board and Residence, 35/6 to 3 guineas weekly.

NEWLYN'S (Royal Exeter) HOTEL, Close Pier; 1st Class; Moderate.

SILVER HOW. Boarding Est. West Cliff Gdns. From 30s. week.

BRIDPORT (Near West Bay), DORSET.

BOARD RESIDENCE. Every Comfort. 10, West St., Bridport.

BRIGHTON.

THE HOTEL METROPOLE.

E. Richard, Manager.

ROYAL YORK HOTEL.

H. J. Preston.

BUXTON.

ST. ANN'S HOTEL.

First Hotel.

DARTMOOR—YELVERTON.

THE TORS HOTEL.

Tel.: 0199.

Mrs. F. Sara.

BARON'S TEMPERANCE HOTEL. Magnificent Moor Views.

DEAL.

BEACH HOUSE HOTEL.

S. R. Jefferson.

EASTBOURNE.

CLARENCE Private Hotel & Boarding House, Sussex Grdns. 5/- day.

HADDON HALL, Devonshire Place, overlooking Sea. 5/- day.

EXETER.

DELLERS CAFE.

Cathedral Close, and at Paignton.

GREAT YELDHAM—ESSEX.

THE WHITE HART HOTEL.

Proprietor, W. Pearl.

HENLEY-ON-THAMES.

RED LION HOTEL.

Overlooking famous Regatta course.

ILFRACOMBE.

COLLINGWOOD PRIVATE HOTEL. 120 Rooms. Facing Sea.

LEEDS.

HOTEL METROPOLE, 2 minutes' walk from either station.

LIVERPOOL.

COMPTON HOTEL, Church Street.

Wm. Russell.

Telegrams: "Compton." Telephone: 3032 Royal, 3 wires.

LLANELLY.

CLEVELAND HOTEL.

J. T. Weaver.

MALDON.

TEMPERANCE HOTEL, Market Hill.

C. Simons, Manager.

MALVERN.

HARDWICKE PRIVATE HOTEL. Prop. & M'g'r.—J. Wilson.

MANCHESTER.

THE PRINCES CAFE.

Oxford Street.

THE DEANS GATE HOTEL.

Deansgate.

MATLOCK.

SMEDLEY'S Hydropathic Establishment. Estab. 1853. H. Challand, Mnger.

ROCKSIDE HYDRO. Tennis, Bowls, &c. Nr. Golf Links. (18 holes).

OXFORD (near).

SUNNINGWELL HALL, Boars Hill. Dry, Sunny, Golf, etc. Lecture

PENTRE.

PENTRE HOTEL, Rhondda. Tel. No. P.O. 30. W. H. Miles.

PLYMOUTH.

GOODBODY'S CAFES.

And at Torquay.

SWISS CAFE, Union Street.

Moderate.

Genoni Bros.

PORTSMOUTH.

SPEEDWELL HOTEL.

A. Grigsby, Managing Director.

SOUTHSEA.

STRATHEARN MANSIONS, South Parade. Miss Collis, Manageress.

ST. MORITZ, ENGADINE.

BELVEDERE, high-class English Family Hotel. Situated in sunniest and finest position. Inclusive terms 11 to 20 francs.

SWANAGE.

"CRAIGSIDE," Board Residence. Tel.: 6.

Misses Fell.

TEIGNMOUTH.

REGENT RESTAURANT & Criterion Hall for Catering. W. H. Bonner.

WHITBY.

WEST CLIFF PRIVATE HOTEL.

Mrs. T. Newbitt.

WOODFORD GREEN, ESSEX.

WILFRED LAWSON. Temp. Hotel, J. J. Blundell Manager.

EDUCATIONAL.

BOOTHAM SCHOOL, YORK.

(Under the Management of the Society of Friends.)

Twenty-six boys passed University Entrance Examinations in 1906 and 1907.

A new feature for post-Matriculation students is a CITIZENSHIP COURSE, including Economics and Modern History with special reference to existing political institutions and social problems.

The School continues to hold a strong position in Leisure-Hour work:—Natural History, Archaeology, Carpentry, etc.

For copies of prospectus and full particulars with regard to scholarships, apply to the Head Master, Bootham School, York.

Head Master: Arthur Rowntree, Certificate of Distinction in the Theory, History, and Practice of Education, Cantab.

THE HINDHEAD SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Principal: Miss J. F. GRUNER, Certificated Student of Girton College, late Second Mistress, Dulwich High School, G.P.D.S.Co. Education thoroughly modern; physical training and outdoor games. Great attention is paid to healthful conditions of life. The boarding-house stands at an elevation of 800 ft.—For prospectus address to BRACKENHURST, HINDHEAD, HASLEMERE, R.S.O.

THE LEYS SCHOOL, CAMBRIDGE.

ENTRANCE SCHOLARSHIPS IN MARCH.

Preparatory School at Hitchin recognised by the Governors. Enquiries should be addressed to the BURSAR.

INFORMATION AND ADVICE AS TO SCHOOLS.

THE SCHOLASTIC, CLERICAL, AND MEDICAL ASSOCIATION, LTD. (a body of Oxford and Cambridge graduates), gives advice and assistance without charge to Parents and Guardians in the selection of schools (for GIRLS AND BOYS) at home or abroad, and as to Tutors (ARMY, NAVY, UNIVERSITY, &c.). A statement of the requirements should be sent to the Manager,

R. J. BEEVOH, M.A., 22, Craven Street, Trafalgar Square, W.C. Telegrams: "TRIFORM. LONDON." Telephone No. 1854 GERRARD

SEASIDE SCHOOLS FOR GIRLS.

BROADWATER HALL, WORTHING.

Good English Education. Eight Acres of Grounds.

LE PLEIN AIR, DIEPPE.

Languages, Accomplishments, Needlework, Cookery. Principals—THE MISSES TRITTON.

AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE, TAMWORTH.

YOUTHS TRAINED FOR HOME OR COLONIES.

Farm, 1,000 acres. Carpentry, Smith's work. Riding and Shooting taught. Prospectus.

CO-EDUCATION.

ST. LEONARD'S SCHOOL, BALDOCK, HERTFORDSHIRE, has been Opened for BOYS AND GIRLS.

Principal—MRS. ENNIS RICHMOND.

(Author of "Boyhood," "Through Boyhood to Manhood," etc.)

Head Master—MR. KENNETH RICHMOND.

"A Natural Education" and "For Our Daughters." Lectures given by Mrs. Richmond on the Co-Education of Boys and Girls may be had from Messrs. G. Street & Co., Ltd., 42, Albemarle-street, London, W. Price 3d. each; single copy 4d., post free.

WILLASTON SCHOOL, NANTWICH.

The next Entrance Examination will be held at the SCHOOL ON MARCH 31st.

For particulars of admission on the Foundation, apply to the Head Master.

SCHOOL OF SOCIOLOGY AND SOCIAL ECONOMICS,

63, 64, Denison House, 298, Vauxhall Bridge Road, S.W.

SIX LECTURES ON SOME SOCIOLOGICAL PROBLEMS IN THE UNITED STATES will be given by MR. J. GRAHAM BROOKS President, American Social Science Association, at 4.30 p.m. on consecutive Tuesdays, beginning March 3rd. Course ticket, 5s. Single admission, 1s. Further particulars may be had from the Hon. Secretary

RUGBY SCHOOL.

THE EXAMINATION FOR SCHOLARSHIPS

Will Begin MONDAY, JUNE 1st.

Particulars may be obtained from the Secretary.

THE INDEX TO
VOLUME I. OF THE NATION

Is NOW READY, and can be had free on application to the Manager.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Curio Club
Bargains

Private persons desirous of disposing of antiques at bargain prices will find a ready sale for same at the "London Opinion Curio Club" 107, Regent Street, London, W.

FERTILISERS for HORTICULTURAL USE.—Write for descriptive price list; carriage paid for 4 cwt. and upwards.—Hy. Richardson & Comp., Manufacturers of Artificial Fertilisers, Skeldergate Bridge, York.

PARR'S BANK, LIMITED.

NOTICE IS HEREBY GIVEN that the Rate of Interest allowed by this Bank at the Head Office and Metropolitan Branches, on Deposit at seven days' call, is Two per cent per annum until further notice.

R. W. WHALLEY, General Manager.

Bartholomew Lane, E.C., 5th March, 1908.

SATURDAY
WESTMINSTER

CARTOONS BY "F.C.G."

SHORT STORIES,

BOOK REVIEWS,

LITERARY ARTICLES,

PROBLEMS AND PRIZES,

SURVEY OF THE WEEK,

BRIDGE, CHESS, PHOTO-

GRAPHY.

NATURE AND SCIENCE,

Etc., Etc.

(One Penny Weekly.)

NOTICE.

THE NATION is published weekly. Applications for copies and Subscriptions should be sent to THE NATION Office, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent Garden.

Terms of Subscription, Including Postage:

HOME, 26s. PER ANNUM. FOREIGN, 30s. PER ANNUM.

Cheques should be made payable to THE MANAGER, THE NATION, and crossed "National Provincial Bank."

Telephone No. Gerrard 4035.

Telegrams: "Nationetta," London.

THE NATION may be obtained from the following book-sellers abroad:—

Paris—Galignani's Library, Rue de Rivoli.

Paris—W. H. Smith & Son's Bookshop, 248, Rue de Rivoli.

Nice—Galignani's Library.

Stockholm—Norden and Jephson.

Vienna—Mr. William Frick, Graben 27.

Christiania—The Cammermeyer Boghandel, Carl Johans Gade, 41 and 43.

Melbourne, Sydney, Brisbane, Perth, West Australia—Gordon and Gotch.

Where single Copies can be obtained, and Subscriptions are received.

Scale of Charges for Advertisements.

	FULL PAGE.	½ PAGE.	¼ PAGE.	Narrow Column. ½ PAGE.
Back Page, or Page facing matter ... }	£10 0 0	£5 10 0	£3 0 0	£3 10 0
Other Pages ...	8 0 0	4 10 0	2 10 0	3 0 0

Hotels, Hydros, and Educational:

13 Insertions ...	8d. per line.
52 ..	6d. ..

CHATTO & WINDUS

CAIRO, JERUSALEM, AND DAMASCUS:

THREE CHIEF CITIES OF THE EGYPTIAN SULTANS.

By D. S. MARGOLIOUTH, D.Litt., Laudian Professor of Arabic in the University of Oxford.
Fully Illustrated in Colour by W. S. S. TYRWHITT, R.B.A., and REGINALD BARRATT, A.R.W.S.
20s. net.

THE RHINE.

By H. J. MACKINDER,

Sometime Reader in Geography in the University of Oxford.

Fully Illustrated after Water-colours

By Mrs. JAMES JARDINE, with Two Folding Maps in Colour.

Large foolscap 4to, cloth, gilt top, 20s. net.
Publishers' Circular.—"Not for forty years has any work given us such a desire again to visit the glorious valley of the Rhine as this. . . . Illustrations and text are admirable."

THE GREATER ABBEYS of ENGLAND

By the Right Rev. ABBOT GASQUET

With Sixty Illustrations in Water-Colours after Warwick Globe, the subjects selected by the Author.

[Late April.

Large fcap. 4to, cloth, gilt top, 20s. net.

MARIE DE MEDICIS AND THE COURT OF FRANCE IN THE XVIIth CENTURY.

Demy 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d. net. [March.
Authorised English Version, translated from the French of M. LOUIS BATTIFOL by MARY KING, under the superintendence of H. W. C. DAVIS, Fellow of Balliol College, Oxford.

With Collotype Frontispiece after a rare engraving of the Queen dated 1601.

JULIE de LESPINASSE

By the MARQUIS de SEUR.

Authorised English Version.

With Photogravure Frontispiece from the only authentic Portrait of Mademoiselle de Lespinnasse by Carmontelle.

Demy 8vo, art linen, gilt top, 7s. 6d. net.

Spectator.—"One of the most enthralling and touching books that have been published of late years."

BALLADS and LYRICS OF LOVE.

Edited with an Introduction and Notes by F. SIDGWICK.

Chiefly selected from "Percy's Reliques."
Illustrated with 10 full-page reproductions after the Water-Colours by BYAM SHAW,
R.I. Large fcap 4to, large type, gilt tops.
cloth, 6s. net. Also 250 numbered Copies on Linen Paper, the Plates mounted, bound whole parchment, 12s. 6d. net. [May.

THE NEW MEDIÆVAL LIBRARY.

Each volume contains illustrations reproduced from the works translated. Also an engraved title-page after a contemporary example. Size, 6½ by 4½ in., boards, cloth, 5s. net; whole brown pigskin, antique style, with clasps, 7s. 6d. net.

NEW VOLUMES.

The Batee's Book: Mediæval Manners for the Young.

The Legend of the Holy Fina, Virgin of Santo Geminiano.

Other volumes in preparation.

List of volumes already published free on application.

A HISTORY OF THE JEWS IN ENGLAND.

By ALBERT M. HYAMSON.

With 16 Portraits and Views and 2 Maps

Demy 8vo, cloth, 4s. 6d. net.

The story told in these pages shows all the vicissitudes common these two thousand years to the lot of Jewry.

The Evening Standard.—"We welcome a volume which is full of special and general importance."

MOLIERE: A Biography.

By H. C. CHATFIELD TAYLOR.

With an introduction by THOMAS F. CRANE, Professor of Romance Languages, Cornell University. With Index, Bibliography, and 10 Illustrations, specially drawn by Job.

Royal 8vo, buckram, gilt top, 10s. 6d. net.
"Mr. Chatfield Taylor . . . is to be congratulated upon a thoroughly workman-like and eminently readable presentation of Moliere. . . . Engagingly interesting."
—Daily Telegraph.

THE MEDICI SERIES OF COLOURED REPRODUCTIONS AFTER THE OLD MASTERS.

Daily Telegraph.—"The Medici Reproductions are of surpassing excellence . . . give absolutely the impression of the pictures themselves, even as regards irregularities of surface." Burlington Magazine.—"Nothing of the kind so good or so cheap has ever before been offered to the public."

- | | |
|---|---------------|
| I. LUINI. Head of the Virgin Mary (Fresco).
Colour surface, 13½ by 10½ in. | 12s. 6d. net. |
| II. LEONARDO DA VINCI. Head of the Christ (Cartoon).
Colour surface, 13½ by 10½ in. | 12s. 6d. net. |
| III. BOTTICELLI. The Virgin and Child (Tempera).
Colour surface, 13½ by 9½ in. | 12s. 6d. net. |
| IV. LEONARDO DA VINCI. The Last Supper (Fresco).
Colour surface, 31½ by 16 in. | 25s. net. |
| V. PIERO DELLA FRANCESCA. Portrait of an unknown
Lady. Colour surface, 15½ by 11½ in. | 10s. 6d. net. |
| VI. LORENZO DI CREDI. The Annunciation (Tempera).
Colour surface, 17½ by 12 in. | 15s. net. |

Occasional Plate, 1.

LIPPI-FILIPPO. The Virgin, after the Painting in Tempera on Wooden Panel, Uffizi Gallery, Florence, of the Virgin, Child, St. John, and an Angel. Coloured surface, 13½ by 10 in. Size of Original, 36 by 24 in. 10s. 6d. net.

Full Particulars of Plates and Frames, with method of publication and terms of subscription, will be found in an illustrated Prospectus, which may be had post free on application.

FURTHER ISSUES SHORTLY.

The English edition of the following works is limited to one hundred copies of each—fifty of which are for America.

EARLY PAINTERS OF THE NETHERLANDS, from the Van Eyck to Pieter Brueghel the Elder.

With 50 Reproductions in Coloured Collotype after the Original Paintings. Issued in Ten Parts in Card Portfolios. £5 5s. net per part. Part IV. now ready.

EARLY GERMAN PAINTERS, from Meister Wilhelm of Cologne to Adam Elsheimer.

With 50 Reproductions in Coloured Collotype after the Original Paintings. Issued in Ten Parts in Card Portfolios. £5 5s. net per part. Part II. ready in May.

ITALIAN PAINTERS OF THE QUATTRO-CENTO AND CINQUECENTO.

With 75 Reproductions in Coloured Collotype after the Original Paintings. Issued in Fifteen Parts in Card Portfolios. £5 5s. net per part. Part II. ready in May.

The Burlington Magazine.—"They are the most marvellous specimens of colour reproduction which we have hitherto seen. . . . Details are rendered with a minuteness even greater than that of a fine photogravure. . . . The rendering of colour is also marvellous. . . . The usefulness of such a publication as an adjunct to public galleries and museums which can never hope to acquire important originals by the rarer masters cannot be exaggerated. . . . No one who takes an interest in the primitive masters should lose the opportunity of examining the pictures."

The publishers invite attention to the method of publication, etc., which are given in detail in a specially prepared illustrated prospectus. This will be sent post free on application.

Messrs. CHATTO & WINDUS beg to announce that their exhibition of the Medici Series of Coloured Reproductions and The Early Painters Series at the New Dudley Gallery, 169, Piccadilly, will remain open until the end of the month.

London: CHATTO & WINDUS, Dept. P, 111, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.

The Nation

SATURDAY, MARCH 7, 1908.

WILLIAMS AND NORGATE.

THEOLOGICAL TRANSLATION LIBRARY. Subscribers to this Library obtain Three Volumes for 22s. 6d., post free, otherwise the volumes cost 10s. 6d. net each, plus postage. The following Volumes are in active preparation:—

In the Press.
Demy 8vo. Cloth. 10/6.
THE CHRISTIAN LIFE
By
THEODOR HAERING.
Professor of New Testament Dogmatics and Ethics at Tübingen.

In the Press.
Demy 8vo. Cloth. 10/6.
PRIMITIVE CHRISTIANITY
Vol. II. Historical Books.
By OTTO PFLEIDERER,
Professor of Practical Theology in the University of Berlin.

Ready.
Demy 8vo. Cloth. 10/6.
ST. PAUL: The Man and His Work.
By PROF. H. WEINEL,
of the University of Jena.
"Prof. Weinel may be described as the Dean Farrar of Germany; the work is quite equal to Dean Farrar's work on the same subject. In some respects it is better."—Daily News.

The following Volumes are included in this year's Subscription:—

Ready. Demy 8vo. Cloth. 10/6 net.
PRIMITIVE CHRISTIANITY
By OTTO PFLEIDERER,
(of Berlin.)
"As a readable, persuasive account of early Christianity from one standpoint, they well deserve to be laid before English readers."—British Weekly.

Ready. Demy 8vo. Cloth. 10/6 net.
The Introduction to the CANONICAL BOOKS OF THE OLD TESTAMENT
By CARL CORNILL,
University of Breslau.
"Professor Cornill has worked in such vigorous, wise and original fashion that no serious student may neglect him."—Guardian.

Just Ready.
Demy 8vo. 10/6 net.
OUTLINES OF CHURCH HISTORY
By H. VON SCHUBERT.
"Professor Schubert has performed this task with a masterly hand. It is no exaggeration to say that this compendium of church history is immeasurably ahead of any other in the English language."—The Nation.

Complete List of Volumes 1-24 in this Library, along with Catalogue of recent and new Theological Works post free upon application.

CROWN THEOLOGICAL LIBRARY.

Professor Marcus Dods:—"Your 'Crown' Library has done a wonderful service to theological learning in this country."
Rev. Principal A. E. Garvie:—"I am very grateful for the publication of these volumes."
Rev. Principal Forsyth:—"As a whole it is an admirable series."

Volumes in active preparation:—

Crown 8vo. Cloth 5/-
LIBERAL ANGLICANISM
Twelve Essays by Prof. Percy Gardner, Dr. Hastings Rashdall, Prof. F. C. Burkitt, Rev. Dr. W. D. Morrison, Sir Thomas Dyke Acland, Rev. A. L. Lilley, Rev. Hubert Handley, Rev. J. R. Wilkinson, etc.

Vol. II. NEW TEST STUDIES. 6/-
THE SAYINGS OF JESUS
By ADOLF HARNACK,
D.D.
Vol. I. Just Ready.
LUKE THE PHYSICIAN
Crown 8vo. 6/-

In the Press.
FUNDAMENTAL TRUTHS OF THE CHRISTIAN RELIGION
By R. SEEBERG.
Professor of Systematic Theology in Berlin.
Sixteen Lectures delivered before the students of all Faculties in the University of Berlin.

Volumes which have recently been published:—

Ready. Crown 8vo. Cloth. 5/-
THE HISTORICAL EVIDENCE FOR THE RESURRECTION OF JESUS CHRIST
By KIRSOPP LAKE,
M.A. (Oxon.),
Professor of N.T. Exegesis in University of Leiden.

Ready. Crown 8vo. Cloth. 5/-
THE APOCETIC OF THE NEW TESTAMENT
By Rev. E. F. SCOTT,
M.A., of Prestwick;
Author of "The Fourth Gospel: Its Purpose and Theology."

Ready. Crown 8vo, 6/-
NATURALISM AND RELIGION
By RUDOLF OTTO,
Professor of Theology in the University of Gottingen.
Translated by Prof. J. Arthur Thomson (Aberdeen).

DETAILED LIST OF VOLUMES IN THIS LIBRARY

Post free on Application.

New Volume by DR. JOHN HUNTER.
DE PROFUNDIS CLAMAVI.
By JOHN HUNTER, D.D., of Trinity Church, Glasgow.

PRINCIPAL CONTENTS—The Atonement, The Universal Cross, Inspiration, Revelation, The God of Jesus, Devotional Culture, No Separation from the Love of God, Faith in God, &c.
The Best Results of Dr. Hunter's Studies in recent years will be put forth in this volume.
IN THE PRESS. Large Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

1 Vol., large crown 8vo, 6s.
EARLY CHRISTIAN ETHICS IN THE WEST
FROM CLEMENT TO AMBROSE.

By H. H. SCULLARD, M.A., D.D., Professor of Church History and Christian Ethics and History of Religion in New and Hackney Colleges, London.
"An able review of the ethical thought of the early Church writers."—The Times.
"Brings out with great clearness the quickening effect of Christianity upon ethics."—Glasgow Herald.

WORKS BY HERBERT SPENCER.

In two volumes. Demy 8vo. Buckram; Gilt Tops, with a number of Illustrations, some in Photogravure, 28s. net, 29s. post free.

AN AUTOBIOGRAPHY.

A System of Synthetic Philosophy.

FIRST PRINCIPLES. Thoroughly Revised. Popular re-issue now ready .. 7 6
PRINCIPLES OF BIOLOGY. 2 vols. (Revised and Enlarged) .. 36 0
PRINCIPLES OF PSYCHOLOGY. 2 vols. .. 38 0
PRINCIPLES OF SOCIOLOGY. Vol. I. .. 21 0
Ditto. Vol. II. .. 18 0
Ditto. Vol. III. .. 18 0
PRINCIPLES OF ETHICS. Vol. I. .. 15 0
Ditto. Vol. II. .. 12 6
JUSTICE (Separately) .. 6 0

THE DATA OF ETHICS

JUST READY.

Uniform with New Edition of "First Principles."
Entirely re-set. Cloth, 3s. net.

OTHER WORKS.

THE STUDY OF SOCIOLOGY .. 10 6
EDUCATION (Cheap Edition) .. 2 6
ESSAYS. 3 Vols. .. 30s. (or each Vol. 10s.)
FACTS AND COMMENTS .. 6 0
VARIOUS FRAGMENTS. Enlarged Edition .. 6 0
SOCIAL STATICS and MAN v. STATE 10 0
MAN v. STATE (Separately) .. 1 0
AGAINST THE METRIC SYSTEM.
Third Edition, with Additions .. 0 3

DESCRIPTIVE SOCIOLOGY.

Compiled and Abstracted by DR. DUNCAN, DR. SCHEPPIG, and MR. COLLIER. Folio, boards.

1. English. 18s. 5. Asiatic Races. 18s.
2. Ancient American Races. 16s. 6. American Races. 18s.
3. Lowest Races, Negritos, Polynesians. 18s. 7. Hebrews and Phœnicians. 21s.
4. African Races. 16s. 8. French. 30s.

IN PREPARATION.

Edited by HENRY R. TEDDER, Secretary and Librarian of the Athenæum Club.

CHINESE. Compiled and Abstracted by E. T. C. WERNER, H.M.'s Consular Service, China.

ANCIENT EGYPTIANS. Compiled and Abstracted by Prof. A. WIEDEMANN, Professor of Egyptology, Bonn.

HELLENIC GREEKS. Compiled and Abstracted by Rev. Dr. J. P. MAHAFFY and Prof. W. A. GOLIGHER, Trinity College, Dublin.

HELLENISTIC GREEKS. By the same.

A Complete List of Works, with Contents, post-free upon application.

Digest of Mr. Herbert Spencer's Works.

Fourth and Enlarged Edition. The Philosophy completed, now ready. 8vo, cloth, price 21s.

EPITOME OF THE SYNTHETIC PHILOSOPHY OF HERBERT SPENCER.

By F. HOWARD COLLINS.

With a Preface by HERBERT SPENCER.

FOURTH LARGE IMPRESSION.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d. net; 2s. 9d. post free.

LIFE & MATTER.

By SIR OLIVER LODGE.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE, 14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, London, W.C.

THE INTERNATIONAL

No. 4 (MARCH). NOW READY. 1s. NET.

PRINCIPAL CONTENTS :

- CONCERNING CYNICISM. By MAXIM GORKY.
- SUNDAY OBSERVANCE IN ENGLAND. By W. T. STEAD.
- THE FUTURE OF THE RELIGIOUS TEMPERAMENT. By EMILE BOUTROUX.
- THE GERMAN COLONISATION OF POLAND. By Dr. H. HASSE.
- FIDUS (with Illustration). By ARUS RENTSCH.
- THE WORLD'S PROGRESS :
THE FUTURE OF RELIGION. By THE EDITOR.
- SOCIAL REFORM :
LEGISLATION AND ALCOHOL. By DR. R. HERCOD.
- THE LABOUR MOVEMENT :
SOCIALISM v. LABOUR. By EDWARD R. PEASE.
- SCIENCE AND INVENTIONS :
THE PROGRESS OF THE AEROPLANE.
- RELIGION :
THE FREETHOUGHT AND ETHICAL MOVEMENTS IN ENGLAND. By JOSEPH M'CABE.
- DRAMA AND ART :
THE IRISH THEATRE. By HOLBROOK JACKSON.

FREE—A copy of No. 1 of "THE INTERNATIONAL" will be sent to any reader of "The Nation" on receipt of 3d. for Postage.

T. FISHER UNWIN, 1, Adelphi Terrace, London.

THE SOCIALIST MOVEMENT IN ENGLAND.

By BROUGHAM VILLIERS. 10s. 6d. net.

This is the first work which in any degree adequately explains the evolution and character of the Socialist Movement in this country.

LIFE OF GOETHE.

By HEINRICH DÜNTZER. With Authentic Illustrations and Facsimiles. Cloth. Cheap Edition. 2s. 6d. net.

"Contains much information that has never before found its way into print."—Daily Telegraph.

THE PROGRAMME OF MODERNISM.

A reply to the Encyclical Pascendi of Pius X. Translated from the Italian by FATHER TYRRELL. 5s. net.

"Amidst the quickly growing mass of literature dealing with the Modernist Movement in the Roman Catholic Church, this little volume may, without hesitation, be singled out as the best source of information for those who want to know the facts in brief."—Manchester Guardian.

THE MERMAID SERIES. THE BEST PLAYS OF THE OLD DRAMATISTS.

LITERAL REPRODUCTIONS OF THE OLD TEXT.

With Photogravure Frontispieces.

A List of the Volumes, with full particulars of the Special Edition in preparation, will be sent post free to any address on application.

T. FISHER UNWIN, 1, ADELPHI TERRACE, LONDON.

MACMILLAN'S NEW BOOKS. MODERN EGYPT.

BY THE
EARL OF CROMER.

With Portrait of Author and Map. Two vols., 24s. net.

The Standard.—"The book is not only absorbing in its interest but it is a contribution to contemporary history of the highest importance. . . . To those who want to know how modern Egypt came into being, and to those who would learn what modern Egypt is, the book is invaluable. It may be supplemented; it cannot be superseded."

SECOND IMPRESSION NOW READY.

A NEW BOOK ON BUDDHISM.

THE INWARD LIGHT. By H. FIELDING HALL,
Author of "The Soul of a People," &c. 8vo, 10s. net.

THE LETTERS OF MARTIN LUTHER. Sel. cted and Translated by MARGARET A. CURRIE. 8vo, 12s. net.

NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION WITH INTRODUCTION.

PRINCIPLES OF WESTERN CIVILISATION. A Sociological Study. By BENJAMIN KIDD, Author of "Social Evolution." Extra Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

The Observer.—"As to the richness and depth of these pages and the profound significance of their endeavour to elucidate the main law of progress in organised societies, there has never been any question among the few. But the many have not as yet discovered this great study, and we cannot wish better for the Empire than that the book should be widely read and pondered upon in its new shape."

THE POCKET KIPLING.

Scarlet limp leather, 5s. net. per vol.

FROM SEA TO SEA.—Vol. II.

THE PRIMADONNA. A Sequel to "Soprano."
By F. MARION CRAWFORD. 6s. [Tuesday.]

"A great work of art."—The Times.

NOW COMPLETE IN THREE VOLUMES.

THE DYNASTS A Drama of the Napoleonic Wars.

BY

THOMAS HARDY. In 3 Parts. CR, 8vo,
4s. 6d. net each.

The Times.—"A great work of art. . . . Mr. Hardy has achieved a work of art by doing violence to a form, and has sublimated a vast and infinitely various material into a single shapely whole. For a like achievement we can only go back to one thing—the historical plays of Shakespeare, where great and small are, as here, seen with a single eye, and where, as here, the common life of common humanity is made a part of the progress of history."

Mr. W. L. COURTNEY, in the Daily Telegraph.—"We now have the third and final volume, bringing to a fine, sonorous conclusion a piece of work which is as remarkable as any which have been produced in the contemporary period. . . . A most vivid and impressive composition, based on a vast amount of knowledge of the subject with which it deals, and reared into a fantastic structure, full of genius and insight. . . . One of the most magnificent contributions which Mr. Hardy has made to the literature of our time."

Mr. ALFRED NOYES, in the Daily Graphic.—"The work should take its place at once as one of the greatest poems of modern times. To begin with, it has, though on a much larger scale, all the great qualities of Mr. Hardy's novels—their structural perfection, their scientific precision and lucidity, their irony, their symbolism, and their extraordinary power of conveying a vast sense of movement, whether of heather on a lonely wind-swept heath, of armies, or of the starry heavens."

MACMILLAN & CO., Ltd., London.

PUBLIC OPINION

A Weekly Review of Current Thought and Activity.

EVERY FRIDAY.

TWOPENCE.

Edited by PERCY L. PARKER.

The purpose of PUBLIC OPINION is to provide information by means of a weekly review of current thought and activity as they are expressed in the world's newspapers, magazines and books, and to put on record the ideas and activities which make for religious, political and social progress.

PUBLIC OPINION can be obtained from any Newsagent or Bookstall, or will be sent post free for one year to any address in the United Kingdom for 10s. 10d.; and to any place abroad for 13s. per annum. Orders should be addressed to—

PUBLIC OPINION,

30 & 31, Temple House, Tallis St., London, E.C.

Specimens free on application.

The Nation

Reviews.

THE MAID.*

ONE could not wish M. Anatole France a subject more suited to his gifts, literary and scientific, than the life of Jeanne d'Arc. Nor will the expectations of those who have expected most from him be disappointed. His dealing with the sources is a model of critical method; his temperament strikes the note of sympathy with his heroine, if not with the causes which her name has been employed to support; his critical faculty and trained historical imagination enable him to reproduce the fifteenth century environment—the beliefs, the thoughts, the atmosphere of the age.

To sift the documents is no easy task. From the first the Maid moved in a world of fancy rather than of fact. At no period of her life was she known otherwise than by fable; and her power over popular imagination and sentiment was due to the legends which grew up where her feet had passed and went before her to prepare her way. Nor, for all her simplicity, can her own account of herself be accepted without discrimination. She was what is called to-day a psychic; and her hallucinations made her, for the most part, incapable of distinguishing imagination from event. There was an underlying fact of consciousness, but the construction built upon it effectually hid it from view. Again, the chroniclers of the time are not historians in our sense of the word. They were salaried retainers—every great family kept one—and wrote each in the interest of the chief by whom he was retained. Objective or scientific history was not yet born. The notion of fact was undefined and, as it were, floating: "il semble que les âmes fussent alors baignées dans un demi-jour où rien ne paraissait distinct." Of Jeanne herself, the one thing that can be said with certainty is that she was a saint, with all the attributes of sanctity as it was understood in the fifteenth century. She saw visions, she heard voices; nor were the more rudimentary senses unaffected by her abnormal states of consciousness; she perceived the heavenly visitants who manifested themselves to her by touch and smell. Her squire, Jean d'Aulon, testifies that she never quite emerged from childhood; the peasants who had known her from infancy thought her weak in mind. That limitations of this kind should co-exist with genius, with singular gifts of will, and even of intellect, is no surprise to psychologists. On this union of endowments, which is the key to her whole story, M. Anatole France's second volume will contain an important appendix by Dr. George Dumas, of the Sorbonne.

How many readings of the puzzle this, which we cannot doubt is the genuine, solution excludes! The Maid has been claimed in turn by royalists, clericals, and republicans: a Jesuit writer, Père Ayroles, has been found to present her, in five volumes, as an Ultramontane, and her judges as the Liberals, or Modernists, of their time. It is an anachronism to attribute to her such parts, or the qualities required to play them. A genius, yes; a politician with a programme, no. And the psychic in her predominates even over the genius; it is among the visionaries, with a Catherine of Siena, a Colette, a Suzette Labrousse—the prophetess of the Constitutional Church—that we must place her; she had open, very open, doors. The last word of the enigma being, M. France believes, that, like most, if not all, visionaries, she was acted upon by suggestion; "un directeur, qu'on ne voit pas, les mène." This is not to assume deception on his side, far less on hers; the unconscious plays a part as important as that of the conscious in human affairs.

Consider this in connection with her Voices. In troubled times forecasts of a brighter future pass easily from mouth to mouth. It was not from the villagers about her, the "Procès" tells us, that she learned the prophecy that France, lost by a woman, would be saved by a Virgin. The ecclesiastical origin of the thought, plainly borrowed from St. Irenaeus' parallel between Eve and Mary, the second Eve, is obvious: and the source of the clause added to it, that this Saviour-Virgin was to come from the Marches of Lorraine, is unmistakable.

"La prophétie ainsi complétée et dirigée part d'un clerc dont les intentions se laissent facilement voir. Dès lors on surprend une pensée qui agit, et pèse sur la jeune visionnaire. Cet homme d'Eglise des bords de la Meuse qui, dans l'humilité des champs, songeait au sort du pauvre peuple et, pour tourner les visions de Jeanne au bien du royaume et à la conclusion de la paix, poussait l'ardeur de son zèle pieux jusqu'à recueillir les prophéties sur le salut du Lis de France et à les compléter avec une précision utile à ses desseins, il faut le chercher parmi ces prêtres, ces religieux lorrains ou champenois qui souffraient cruellement des malheurs publics. C'est dans la multitude obscure des âmes troublées par l'affliction et les scandales de l'Eglise que se devine le prophète et l'initiateur de la Pucelle."

She was, in fact, much among such persons, having kinsmen both among the regular and secular clergy. She was too simple to associate them with the message given by her Voices—the Voices themselves were easily accounted for—nor is it necessary to suppose that their influence over her was designed or even conscious. She was devout beyond her years and state, and her innocence was equal to her devotion: she lived in person and in mind a maid. And the Voices came to her, more and more persistent, more and more urgent, bidding her leave her home, deliver France from the English invaders, and take the Dauphin to be crowned at Rheims. It was a drama of romance. But it was carried out successfully; though for the child protagonist the end was a tragedy of blood and fire.

The belief in witchcraft, that strange survival of primitive man, has been the cause of more human misery than any other superstition. The original notion of the Deity is not ethical. He is conceived as a force, at first malevolent; then capricious, by turns and without apparent reason hostile and friendly, to be deceived, bribed, or cajoled. The priest, who in early days is akin to the wizard, is the man who can read most accurately the changing humours of the god, and act accordingly; but soon the white and the black magic fall apart; the priest is feared and honoured, the wizard dreaded and condemned. Certain objects, persons and actions are taboo, but it is only by degrees that this taboo becomes associated with morality—it is not, as a rule, till the god has passed from this stage of development into the tribal and from that into the universal Divinity that he becomes a Holy God. Old Testament history bears obvious traces of this process—and even in our own day the old notions linger in the backwaters of civilisation. The Camorristi, now waiting their trial at Naples, are persons of exemplary piety, though the form that their piety takes is not ethical: a leading charge against one of their chiefs, a cemetery chaplain, is that he traded in the corpses of children, which were used in necromancy and for spells. The past departs slowly—it is seldom so far from us as we suppose.

But what is a survival in the twentieth century was matter of everyday experience in the fifteenth. The peasants of the Der—the forest which, in the Barrois, stretches between the rivers Meuse and Marne—lived in an atmosphere of the preternatural. The old native cults lived on under the official religion—as they had lived on in Greece under the worship of the Olympians; there were spirits of the wood and the stream. Groves and springs were named after them: there was the "Arbre des Fées" and the "Fontaine-aux-Bonnes-Fées-Notre-Seigneur"; the new and the old ran together in one stream of marvel: on "Lâtare," or Mid-Lent, Sunday the villagers "faisaient ce qu'ils appelaient leurs Fontaines," holding rustic festival and hanging garlands at once on the image of the Virgin and on the haunted tree. It was harmless enough in all conscience: the play of a child mind looking out with eyes of wonder on the mystery of life. Whether, or to what extent, unholy rites lay near these simple observances, it is difficult at this distance of time to say: the later life of Gilles de Rais, by the irony of fate one of the Maid's protectors, gives colour to the suspicion that the border-line between the harmless and the harmful was, at times, thin. It is certain that the terror inspired by the illicit supernatural was deep and widespread—the Church claimed a monopoly; and enforced her claims with the rack and the stake. It was not that the reality of the phenomena exhibited by unlicensed practitioners was doubted—such a doubt would have exposed those who entertained it to the penalties of heresy—but that their origin was ascribed to the devil. Hence the gauntlet run by those who possessed, or professed, sanctity—with its usual endowment of psychic attributes. They were primâ facie suspect, and had to prove the quality as well as the fact of their powers. The presumption was against their legitimacy, and illegitimacy meant death. This was the main point on which the Maid's interrogation turned: ten out of the twelve charges on which she suffered concerned her Voices and Visions—were they or were they not of heaven?

* "Vie de Jeanne d'Arc." Tome Premier. Par Anatole France. Paris: Calmann-Lévy. 7 fr. 50.

On the issue we need not dwell. She had dreamed her dream; and, bitter as was the awakening, hers was that "one crowded hour of glorious life" which "is worth an age without a name." Nor was the end at Rouen: there was a Beyond which remains, and will remain, while mankind endures.

"Les plus hautes entreprises périssent dans leur défaite et, plus sûrement encore, dans leur victoire. Le dévouement qui les inspira demeure en immortel exemple. Sa folie fut plus sage que la sagesse, car ce fut la folie du martyr, sans laquelle les hommes n'ont encore rien fondé de grand et d'utile dans le monde."

A SCHOLAR GYPSY.*

THIS abridgement is a mighty work in itself, extending to over six hundred pages.

It must have been as easy to do as it would be to abridge the Bible or Shakespeare, to bridle Behemoth, or to cut the Great Pyramid in two with a hand-saw. Still, it has been done, and well done, and much credit is due to the courageous and laborious abridger. It has been said that there is little use to review this edition of Doughty's work, as it is already a classic. Nothing more futile could be said, even in a newspaper.

The book is, indeed, a classic, for, after the great Burckhardt, Doughty is the man who, perhaps, knew most of Arab life, and had the power of writing what he saw.

Possibly he had not the deep knowledge of the language that Burton and Palgrave possessed; still less had he either the scholarship in Arabic or the opportunities of Burckhardt, who lived as many years in the East as Doughty had passed months. But Palgrave went as a rich man, Burton as a man moderately well off, whereas Doughty and Burckhardt wandered about poor.

Doughty alone proclaimed his faith and nationality, which, if on the one hand it gave him superior opportunities for observation, inasmuch as all the time his mind was free of the task of having to assume a part, upon the other hand must have shut, to some extent, sympathy from him, and made him stand outside. As is said in the preface by the author of the abridgement of the book, the writer's gentleness, courage, humanity, and endurance were superlative.

If I might be allowed to add a quality to these, I should add "pawkiness," for no word better typifies a certain pleasant, shrewd, and humorous, but circumscribed attitude of mind, than does this Scotticism. But though the writer's outlook upon life is, perhaps, narrow, his comprehension of humanity is great. The two are not so incompatible as at first sight appears. Undoubtedly, as Mr. Hogarth in his "Penetration of Arabia" says, Doughty "had a certain prejudice against all things Semitic." This prejudice is not upon the surface; in fact, it only comes to light on careful reading of the book, and, after all, is immaterial, for it in no wise affects his sympathy with the individual Semite. Moreover, one of the first things that is seen in considering all that he did and suffered is that he must have been extremely sympathetic in himself. No one who was not so could have preserved his life during his months of marching amongst the tribes. Still, for sympathy to evoke a sympathy in others shows that it is there, and it is to the credit of the penner of this vast abridgment that he sets down these words: "His narrative indeed testifies how much milk of human kindness the solitary stranger could count upon finding in the heart of all but the most fanatical Mohammedans."

How few members of the Celto-Saxon race are willing to admit as much! Reading the book with care, it seems the traveller rather was a good man than a good fellow. Upright and honest in all his dealings with the Arabs, kindly and sympathetic as he was courteous and philosophic, learned and laborious, indefatigable as he had proved himself a hundred times, a strange peculiarity is to be observed in every line he writes. He gave himself no airs (indeed, to do so in his position would have been impossible), he sympathised entirely with his companions in their joys, their woes, their troubles, and in the hardships of their lives. Physically he evinces no repulsion at their ways, their dirt, at anything; but mentally his outlook upon life is so distinct from theirs that perhaps the contrast is too sharp. Upon the other hand it is interesting, as it shows Arab life reflected in a highly achromatic microscope, so achromatic that we rather lose the shading, although we see the outlines as sharp as if they were cut in glass. No one but Mungo Park and Burckhardt, with whom I am acquainted, ever has lived amongst such people as the Arabs and had the power to write. To find a parallel one has to go to the strange, intensely interesting account (by himself) of the ten years' wandering in Florida of Alvar Nunez, who also went amongst people as wild as or wilder than the Arabs, poor and without protection, and lived to tell it all.

Doughty has special claims upon our sympathy. In these days of scorn and of contempt of everything and everybody who is not of our race, he never once in all his writings comes "God's Englishman" upon us. He never lets us see, even indirectly, that he considered that he was anything but a man travelling amongst men. Indeed, in thinking carefully upon his attitude, I believe that what has been called his anti-Semite prejudice perhaps had no existence, and was but a mere disagreement with a certain type of mind as often to be found in England as in Arabia. As far as we can see from what he writes, his mind worked slowly. Now the Semitic, and especially the Arab, mind works quickly, and between the types the repulsion is as natural as that between the north and south. To say more than that he traversed Arabia in almost its whole length, with a mind alert for fresh discoveries, and a pen just as alert to set down every detail, both of his own and of the tribesmen's lives, during a year and a half, is to say little as to the real merits both of the book and man.

England may claim that all it arrogates to its sons is not quite false, when, now and then, she can produce such an archetype as was the writer of the unabridged edition of the book.

There still remains a word or two to say about the book itself. Considered as a man, nothing could well be simpler than the writer, or more free from all pretence. But I have said he was an Englishman. Now, it is certain that affectation and a want of naturalness is, in modern times, the besetting sin of Celto-Saxons at best. In days of old, the writers of the Saxon chronicle, Cædman and Sagamore, and the half-mystical writer of the Irish story, from which Shakespeare is said to have taken "Lear," were natural writers to a man. Forbye, both branches of the race, Saxons and Celts alike, are never natural when they take their pens in hand.

Doughty is no exception to the rule. In fact, he is, with Meredith and Carlyle, one of the worst offenders against simplicity of speech. Surely the first and foremost requisite of style is to be understood by the mere reader of the book. Chaucer and Shakespeare, Marlowe, Milton, Pope, Dryden, Shelley, Keats, and Burns all wrote mere common English (or Scotch), and did not form a Della Cruscan and cryptic speech, which only those who had, so to speak, passed through the rites of Isis, could hope to understand. It is mere fustian to say, because a man is learned, that he has licence to introduce great "foot and half-foot" words into his books. Though it is not a crime to do so, it is a blemish. Spenser, with all his genius, has been held to err by use of words not understood by those for whom he wrote. Where Spenser nodded, who can hope to succeed? Suppose the Jacobean translators of the Bible had gone back to the speech of Skelton, and filled their text with Hebrew words, surely their version never would have been enshrined in the hearts of everyone? Perhaps they copied in some way the Hebrew diction, and this is what undoubtedly Doughty has sought to do with Arabic. He has felt the greater solemnness of a Semitic tongue; but, by endeavouring to reproduce it, has become obscure.

* "Wanderings in Arabia." By Charles M. Doughty. Being an Abridgment of "Travels in Arabia Deserta." Arranged with Introduction by Edward Garnett. Duckworth & Co. Two Vols. 16s. net.

These blemishes are purely literary. The book remains a monument of observation, insight, patience, and sympathy, of an unusual kind. Better than all, behind the book there yet remains the man.

R. B. CUNNINGHAME GRAHAM.

THE NEW POET.*

I HAVE a Socialist friend who delights to tell me that the only value of poetry is anthropological, that its real human interest lies in the revelation which it makes of individual minds: this, he would say, is something definite and scientific, an honest material for psychology; whereas the beauties of style are, like the forms of the letters or the colour of the ink, irrelevant, mere matters of taste, of so indefinite and uncertain a quality that a man who makes distinction of them may indulge what preference he will, and train himself to like anything.

Mr. Abercrombie is, at first sight, just the poet for my friend, since, with an original mind which reveals itself boldly and sincerely, he betrays a marked indifference to the beauties of literary form; and, as that is likely to set many readers against him, I am glad to be allowed on his behalf to draw some of those literary distinctions which my anthropological friend would think so vain and foolish.

Mr. Abercrombie's predilection is for theological metaphysic; that may not be quite the right term, but it will serve. This subject-matter is not congenial to me, but whatever one may think of it, and whatever one's judgment may be of the writer's success in making poems of it, one must recognise at once not only the genuine nature of his inspiration, that is his earnestness and abundance, but also a most extraordinary gift of lucidity and exposition; so that his most mystical and dreamy imaginations, such as would seem to defy communication, are passed over into the mind of the reader without apparent effort: and this is a source of great pleasure. I will check this remark with a quotation from "The Fool's Adventure." The interlude so-called is a dialogue which a seeker after truth holds with various personifications of mental attitudes. The seeker is hunting the cause of sin; we need not follow the chase, but at one stage he imagines that he has run his game down in the Soul of the World. This personification rebuffs him, and answers him thus:—

"WORLD: Thou knowest me?

Not so. . . . But if thou wilt,
What thou art I will show to thee. My thought Moved in its brooding, and its movement stirred
A ripple in the quiet of the waters
Whereunder my thought's Sabbath is moored deep—
And when my act, this ripple's viewless travel,
The region of the happening of my Will.
In its upheaval reacht the upper calm
Laid on the mere, whose waters are my Will,
Whose surface is Appearance and broad Place,
Its breaking whirls became a journeying wave,
That at the last became a gathered sea,
A pile of all the waters in one tide.
But it is grown to its height; and now, before
The smooth heapt power tumbles down in surf,
Its head is whiten'd with an age of spray,
Weakness beginning. Lo, that spray is Man,
Crest of the wave, and token of its downfall.
Not stately, like the early wave, nor clear,
Nor with an inner lodging for the light,
But troublous, misty, throwing off the light
In glitter, all apieces, loose, uneasy.
Truly my act is near its end when thou,
Man, the loose spray, ride on its stooping neck,
From one firm bulk of waters, one onward gang,
Broken away to be a brawl of drops,
Freedom and hither-thither motions light,
Each drop one to itself, a discrete self.
Thou freedom, thou high self-acquaintance, thou Sin,
Man, dost thou know me? But now know thyself."

Abstruse and strange as this idea of man's place in creation is, it is yet conveyed with such clearness that common attention can seize it at the first reading. In the opening passage of "An Escape," a more mysterious fancy is even more poetically exposed. In this poem the hero, Idwal, is a young poet, also a seeker, who has retired into mountainous solitudes to work out his mystical salvation. He is aware of two souls within him, one of finite, the other of infinite longings: his finite soul has fallen in love with the parson's daughter, but his infinite soul has re-established its ascendancy, and in token of its victory Idwal has been twice visited strangely in his sleep, and knows that if he should sleep again, the same dream will return and cause his death; as actually happens, though the event is made surprising by a device of great simplicity and beauty in the plot. The poem opens with Idwal describing his dream.

"A swift dark dream from the outer lands,
From the folk whose talk none understands,
Along my smooth sleep travelling,
Yet tampering not with my ken's rest,
Passed as undisturbingly
As a night-jar o'er the quietude
Of the clear'd middle of a pine-wood
Seemeth to haunt the evening,
And leave the blue air yet more whist.
And yesternight it haunted me;
Again, suddenly, quietly,
Shadowy wings above my clear sleep.
But swift, so swift, it might scarce be seen;
Not as with me it had to do,
But eagerly, as though it flew
From mystery to mystery,
And my sleep lay in between;
Once before, and yesternight.

So twice I have felt its noiseless flight;
Twice has my sleep been the road
The dark message took in journeying
From the one to the other secret reign;
Out of the dark lying behind,
Into that lying before, man's mind,
My sleep was the only bridge for the thing
Whereon to cross Reality.

But the third time, if it come again,
A stranger, unkindly from the abode
Of Beginnings sent to the place of Dooms,
Showing me thus so easily
Way through the skirts of time to the glooms
That march both sides our bodily place—
My soul will up and give it chase. . . ."

The above passage may need a little more attention, but it seems to me a greater feat of exposition than the other, as the fancy to be exposed is more intangible: it exhibits, however, some insubordination of expression to metrical form; and this defect appears even more plainly in the Choruses of "Peregrinus." The band of young ruffians who come from Corinth to enjoy the sight of that old impostor's self-immolation have their part conceived in a fine classical manner, and their utterances are so well-motivated and vivid that the comparison which is at once challenged with "Samson Agonistes" would not, except for one point, be altogether in Mr. Abercrombie's disfavour. But whereas in Milton the matter of his ode fulfils a design of severe rhythmical beauty, we find in this young poet that the force of his expression seems uncontrolled, and its rhythms accidental, like a translation which is suffering constraint from an uncalculated relation between the words and the metre. This is disappointing in a poet who, at his best, seems to command all the resources of his art. What could be better than such verse as this where the elaboration is purely Miltonic?

"Enough for me

If on an early autumn afternoon
The whole country air smelt burning, and the blue
Wood-smoke loitered about the yellowing copse
And misted all the rides."

Or again, where he fills common cadences with such unmistakeable freshness as in these lines—

"Stars and their golden games in the blue heaven—
. . . . duties of the elements
Whether to be firm standing or steep ruin
And all betwixt—

Man's nature
Unmixing in the general kindliness,
Showing like slime against the deep wide water—
Man's unhappiness,
Wherein he lives as in a smoke."

My quotations will, I think, have been sufficient to show that our new poet may come to take a very high rank, and should not be left to the anthropologists; but he will be generally condemned for lack of finish, and especially for roughness of metre. I would point out that a great many of the irregularities of his blank verse are defensible; for instance, his nine-syllable lines are sometimes Chaucerian, sometimes Shakespearian, while other of his liberties are good Miltonisms, and all these will be lumped in the same condemnation with those other lines of his which will bear no explanation and go far to suggest that the writer despised or despaired of his metre. If he were simply of opinion that it is better that unrhymed verse should not scan at all by rule than that it should be childishly tied up in a monotony of accentual iambics, I might agree with him; but, in that case, it is still bound in some way to outbid prose. Unfortunately, the same lack of form appears sometimes in the grammar also, and in the diction, and, worst of all, in the main construction, and in the manipulation of detail. It is evident that the abundant flow of his fancy has not always an end determined for it. In the climax of "The Fool's Adventure," the divine pronouncement "I am Thyself" is ambiguous, and neither of the contradictory solutions quite satisfies. The close of "The New God" shows that it should not have been attempted. Again, in that admirable motive at the end of "An Escape," where Hazel takes on herself the part of the Earth-goddess, the breadth of his conception misses its beauty for lack of delicacy in the detail of it; a fault more distressingly apparent in "The New God."

* "Interludes and Poems" By Lascelles Abercrombie. John Lane. 5s. net.

I beg Mr. Abercrombie to excuse a frankness of criticism which may seem somewhat impertinent in me. He makes Idwal tell us that poetry is a product of the finite soul when it has so dominated the infinite soul as to have leisure to amuse itself. I wish Mr. Abercrombie's finite soul plenty of leisure; I like it better than his infinite soul; perhaps what is needed is a truce between them. In case my remarks should not please him, I can appeal to his infinite soul with confidence.

I will conclude with two quotations from "Blind," a tramp's tragedy, which for its directness and depth of misery may be thought by many to be his best performance. It is the blind boy who speaks—

"She let me put my hands upon her head:
What a wonderful loveliness is that of hair—
Soft, smooth, delicious as the smell of gorse
In sunlight, and for slipping through your fingers Better than water. Hair—yes, it would be
A nature, I suppose, between sunshine
And water, and yet neither. There must be Words equal to the loveliness of hair;
If I could find them! Golden do they say?
I wish the words for beauty had been made
By men who knew with hands and not with eyes.

* * *

I've often thought, if I were tall enough
And reacht my hand up, I could touch the soft Spread feathers of the resting flight of him
Who covers us with night, so near he seems Stooping and holding shadow over us,
Roofing the air with wings. . . ."

Everyone who reads will wish for more.

ROBERT BRIDGES.

THE IRISH SAINTS.*

LEGENDS of the Saints usually make rather dreary reading. They depend on a few recurring motives: the recital of miracles and martyrdoms, the instances of the holy man's austerity, of his power in intercession, of the virtue of his relics, tend to edification rather than entertainment. This is due in part no doubt to the nature of the subject, but more perhaps to the circumstances of the narrators, who were in most countries cloister-bred monks, living out of the world, men whose experience of life was limited, and their imagination consequently starved and sterile. But the case of Ireland was peculiar. Here the Church came into close touch with a primitive people, whose mythopœic faculty was still active, although its first creative impulse was perhaps exhausted. No one can say precisely when it was that the Gael left off inventing myths about the Dagda and Manannan and heroic tales about Cuchulainn and Conall Cernach. It would seem, however, that when he abandoned the old gods in favour of the Christian theodicy, his invention was diverted into a new channel. Instead of the autochthonous heroes he accepted the Saints of the Church, and his imagination now busied itself with Patrick, Columcille, and the rest of that interminable line. This is one proof of the extraordinary ease and thoroughness with which the Church conquered Ireland. She took the Irish people the right way. She knew how to elicit their freely-given kindness, and how to amuse their active fancy. The consequence is that the stories about Irish Saints present certain features which distinguish them from the general run of such legends. To make this distinctive character prominent seems to have been one of the aims which Lady Gregory had before her in making her selection from the enormous mass of material at her hand.

The most salient quality of these legends is the touch of imagination and romance. Especially characteristic in this respect is the abundant literature of Visions concerning the joys of heaven and the pains of hell: such are the visions of Adamnán, of Fursa, of Laisrén, of Tnúthgal, and many others. This genre springs, indeed, ultimately from imitation either of the Books of Daniel and Ezekiel, or of the Revelation of St. John and other apocalyptic writings of Eastern origin; but it became especially popular in Ireland, from the introduction of Christianity onwards. The Irish missionary no doubt spread the vogue on the Continent, and may thus claim his place as a spiritual forefather of Dante.

It is a pity that with so much undoubted native material before her, Lady Gregory should have chosen as a representative of this type of legend the strange composition known as the "Everliving Tongue." In spite of its Irish dress, this is no true product of the Irish imagination. External signs, such as the ascription to St. Philip, mark its Eastern origin; the unintelligible jargon with which it is interlarded may perhaps conceal mutilated scraps of Hebrew; at all events, the mystical symbolism in which it abounds is quite unlike in character to the fanciful extravagances at all times natural to the Irish mind. The difference between the two styles will strike anyone who turns from the "Everliving Tongue" to another type of romance, less common than the Visions but more interesting, and more indisputably of native growth—the tales of adventures in the Western ocean. The Voyage of Brendan long ago attained European fame, and Tennyson has made the name of Maeldune familiar to English ears. Lady Gregory adds to these the less-known adventures of Snedgus and Mac Riagla (the latter name, by the way, is misprinted on p. 42). It is superfluous to seek any literary origin for such stories. They spring up naturally among an island people; and if they remind one in a general way of the central books of the Odyssey, that merely shows that two Aryan nations, at wide intervals of time and place, invented similar fictions under similar conditions. There is more point in the remark made by Professor Zimmer, that these tales may have been partly suggested by the experience of recluses living on the rocks and islets which lie off the Atlantic coast of Ireland. But in all probability, here as elsewhere, the Church did but adapt to her own ends the traditions that she found current; retaining the romantic incidents, she detached them from the underlying Pagan conceptions, and substituted Christian motives. The ancient "Voyage of Bran" is of the same type as the tales of Brendan, the Húi Corra, and the rest; only the object of Bran's cruise is to find not the Christian paradise but the Other-World of Celtic belief, the Land of the Young, which was imagined as a country either under or across the water. In all these romances, whether Pagan or Christian, we recognise the same turn of fancy, sometimes brilliant and picturesque, sometimes grotesque and extravagant. The "whirling beast" (for instance) which Maeldune saw on an island, possessed the gift of turning in its skin, so that the flesh and bones went round without the skin moving; or conversely, "the skin outside would turn like a mill, the flesh and bones not stirring." Cuchulainn has an equally disconcerting power over his personal appearance in moments of excitement: "taking upon himself the motion of a mill-stone, he strained himself till a warrior's foot could find room between each pair of ribs." That is one description; in other cases the phenomena are still more remarkable.

Apart from this romantic aspect, the legends exhibit the national character in another and a very different light. A certain air of homeliness and humanity belongs to these Irish Saints, which seems to indicate a good understanding between them and their people. Many of them were usually known by affectionate pet names: Mochóemóc, for example, is, as grammarians say, a "hypocoristic" form of Cóemgein, and means "my little Kevin." The same kindly spirit is to be met with everywhere in the popular representation of the Saints, great and small. Patrick, for all his missionary zeal, has much in him that reminds one of some shrewd, kindly parish priest. Lady Gregory has been less fortunate with him than with Brigit and Columcille. Perhaps she has drawn too much on the later of the many Lives of Patrick, instead of deriving her impression from the "Confession" and the other early documents. In the stories told of Columcille there are touches of pleasant humour; as when he finds an old woman subsisting entirely on nettles, and determines to limit himself for the future to the same fare, but is defeated by the pious deceit of his cook, who strengthens his nettle-broth for him unbeknownst. And there is a homely pathos in the description of his death when "the old spent white horse that used to be carrying the milk vessels from the cow-shed in the island to the brothers, cried tears into his breast till his clothes were wet." This fellow feeling between the Saints and the animals, wild or tame, is a common feature in these legends, and there are many examples in Lady Gregory's book; the best of them is the charming page about St. Ciaran, whom the wild creatures help to build his cell, and then live with him and listen to his teaching, and are obedient to him. Only one day the fox stole his brogues, having a mind to eat them:—

* "A Book of Saints and Wonders." By Lady Gregory. Murray. 5s. net.

"But that was showed to Ciaran, and he sent another monk of the monks of his family, that was the badger, to bring back the fox. . . . And Ciaran said to the fox: 'O brother,' said he, 'why did you do this robbery that was not right for a monk to do? And there was no need for you to do it, for we all have food and water in common, that there is no harm in?'"

Whereupon the culprit repented, and did penance, and in the end, like Peter Bell, "became a good and honest fox." This kindness towards the animals is only one form of the Gael's inborn love for wild Nature, for life in the open air, for woods and streams and the music of birds. There is no more perfect expression of this sentiment in any literature than the idyllic song of the monk Marbán; Lady Gregory quotes a few stanzas, but it should be read in full in Dr. Meyer's "King and Hermit." It is addressed by Marbán to his brother, King Guaire, himself almost a saint by reason of his exceeding charity, wherein he rivals King Wenceslas. "He gave alms till his right arm grew to be longer than the left with the dint of stretching it out to the poor." So generous was he that when a bramble bush laid hold of his cloak he would not refuse its importunity, but left the cloak there on the branches.

This love of the land turns with Columcille to homesickness; in exile—though no further off than Iona—he thinks long for his native Doire, and envies those whose lot is cast in the old country:—

"It is the reason I love Doire, for its quietness, for its purity: quite full of white angels is every leaf of the oaks of Doire."

"It is happy the son of Dimma is, when he is listening in Durrow to the desire of his mind; the sound of the wind against the elms, the laughter of the blackbird clapping his wings: to listen at break of day to the lowing of the cattle in Rigrencha: to listen at the brink of summer to the cry of the cuckoo from the tree."

Perhaps it is because of his passionate attachment to Irish soil that tradition has fathered upon Columcille so many of those apocryphal prophecies which foretell the coming of the Saxon, the consequent misery of the Gael, and the ultimate expulsion of the hated intruder.

Lady Gregory has chosen as her vehicle a dialect of her own devising: it is a blend of literary English prose with direct translation from the Gaelic idiom, and its object is perhaps not so much to make the matter intelligible to the good people of Kiltartan, as to suggest an atmosphere remote from the everyday life of modern England.

A FOREIGN CRITIC ON THE ENGLISH STAGE.*

Who is Dr. Mario Borsa? To judge from "The English Stage of To-day" he might be an English critic masquerading as a foreigner, so intimate is his knowledge of the theatrical conditions of London. In his criticism, too, he displays a knowledge which is seldom the basis of foreign criticism of our drama. The result is a very stimulating book, in which we may see ourselves in a mirror that gives back a faithful if not flattering reflection. As all foreign critics, Dr. Borsa is astonished by the indifference of our public to ideas. When the middle-class Englishman goes to the theatre "he wants nothing higher or better than a gentle and pleasing titillation of the senses, just enough to assist, without over-taxing his digestion." To the conventional argument that after a fatiguing day in the City the mind finds its natural recreation in the lightest and most frivolous types of entertainment, Dr. Borsa replies that in Germany, where the conditions of daily life are strenuous enough, contemporary German drama is on a higher plane than English drama. Dr. Borsa thinks it is a question of the general atmosphere in which the middle-class Briton has chosen to envelop himself. There are certain aspects of the matter, however, which the Italian critic, with all his intuition, has not quite grasped. Let us grant that the bulk of middle-class Englishmen are not interested in ideas and do not care to be bothered by them when they go to the theatre. At the same time there is a very large public that is not quite Philistine in this respect. If you do not see them at the theatre it is because our theatres are commercial concerns relying on long runs for their profits, and a long run means that a play must appeal to the mass of people. Roughly speaking, the theatre does not attract the more cultured public as the concert-room, German opera, and French plays attract it. The Savoy Theatre is the only intellectual theatre in London. Miss Lena Ashwell, at the Kingsway, is attempting to found a repertoire theatre on the same plan as the old Court, but she will probably fall a victim to the long run. All other theatres are devoted to after-dinner entertainments. The Garrick and St. James's give us drawing-room melodrama; the Haymarket, Comedy, Hicks's, Criterion, and the rest present flippant farces from the French or childish farces from America; and then there are the musical comedy houses. Mr. Tree alternates Shakespearian and other pageants with melodrama of no artistic value. Excepting the Savoy, what theatre exists for a man who has ideas? In music he has a wide choice.

On one point it is not quite fair of Dr. Borsa to compare our theatres with those of Germany or Paris, for we have no subsidies of any kind. It is well to be quite frank in this matter: music, then, would be in as parlous a state as drama if it were not supported by rich enthusiasts. Very few concerts really pay, and the Queen's Hall would have shut its doors to high-class orchestral music if a syndicate of rich musical enthusiasts had not come forward to save the situation. Opera at Covent Garden was kept going by another syndicate of enthusiasts. Both music and opera are practically subsidised. The theatre in London is largely "backed" by rich men, some of whom look for profit and others are content for different reasons; but none supports a theatre for the sake of the art of drama. The aim has always been to secure a large public for a long run, and when these conditions are understood it is wonderful that London theatres give us as much real drama as they do.

Still, if Dr. Borsa's diagnosis does not go to the very root of the evil, it certainly does sum up most of its manifestations. He has an acute mind, and has evidently studied London theatrical conditions at first hand. This acuteness and independence of thought serve him well in his criticism of our dramatists. In Mr. H. A. Jones's plays, according to Dr. Borsa, you will find realistic elements, but he has never given us a realistic play, because he surrounds them with an atmosphere of restraint and spoils them with his rhetorical dialogue. Moreover, he has never lost the heavy melodramatic touch of his early plays. Dr. Borsa might have added that Mr. Jones's women are too much of a type—flighty, rebellious creatures, hovering in a futile way on the brink of moral catastrophes. What Mr. Pinero "has to tell you about men and things he tells you from the point of view of a casual observer, not of a thinker who has a whole scheme of thought to demonstrate or define; he gives you psychology—but it is psychology condensed into epigrams." Mr. Pinero's power is that "he feels intensely with his characters." Dr. Borsa hardly lays stress on Mr. Pinero's gift of telling a story, nor does he point out that the means by which the dramatist expresses emotion—a curious, rhetorical sort of journalese—robs his plays of realism. To Dr. Borsa, Mr. J. M. Barrie “has the appearance of a boy who, having reached a certain age, has stopped there, and decided that he will absolutely decline to grow any further.” He is at his best, and “produces really charming work when . . . he writes direct for children”—which seems a poor estimate of Barrie’s gifts. On the other hand, a whole chapter of excellent criticism is devoted to Mr. Bernard Shaw. Dr. Borsa does not fall into the error of asserting that Mr. Shaw is not a dramatist, but points out that he has given many new types to the stage.

*"The English Stage of To-day." By Mario Borsa. Translated from the original Italian and edited with a prefatory note by Selwyn Brinton, M.A. John Lane. 7s. 6d. net.

“He undoubtedly possesses a brilliant genius, whose originality is sometimes almost too marked. He has a keen and spontaneous sense of humour; he can, when he so wishes, write dialogue which is sparkling with wit; he is full of vivacity, of the charm of the unexpected; he has plenty to tell us which, even if it is sometimes rough and unpleasant, always reveals a generous ideality of nature—in a word, he is an artist who, if incomplete, still possesses genius. Yet all these good qualities have not succeeded in making G.B.S. the playwright that he might and ought to be. And this is only to be explained by the want of balance of which he is a victim. In Shaw the rational and intellectual faculties not merely predominate, but dominate him despotically; the emotional qualities are either absent or—since some parts of his work betray their presence—are almost completely stifled.”

There is much virtue in that “completely stifled,” for the man who could write parts of “Major Barbara” must silence his emotional qualities of set design.

Dr. Borsa’s criticisms of Granville Barker, St. John Hankin, Alfred Sutro, W. B. Yeats, and other of our dramatists are full of interest, and a page of appreciation is devoted to Mr. John Galsworthy’s “The Silver Box,” “the best play that has been produced at the Court Theatre.” Doubtless many of Dr. Borsa’s opinions are open to discussion, but on the whole his book gives a fair and comprehensive view of the English stage.

AN ITALIAN’S ESSAYS FOR ENGLISHMEN.*

PASQUALE VILLARI, now of a venerable age, is one of the many connecting links between Italian and English literature, character and thought, which in the higher ranges of each have so much in common. It was Mazzini, in his long London exile, who first showed our great men and women of the Victorian age how much that was congenial to them they could find among the best Italians, even more than among the best French and Germans. In our age of little people this connection is still maintained, and an Englishman reading these essays of Signor Villari will find himself intellectually and spiritually at home.

The first and principal essay in the book, entitled “Is History a Science?” will be read with great advantage by any one who has interested himself in that controversy as conducted of recent years in this island. Signor Villari’s opinions are only another sign of the recent reaction against the crude so-called “scientific” view of history, which anathematised all writers who attempted to connect history with literature, with ethics, or with emotion of any sort. The attempt to exclude any element of emotion from the interpretation of the affairs of men was foredoomed to failure by its intrinsic absurdity, and that failure has been hastened by the inability of the “scientific” school of recent years to produce anything that has influenced thought in any marked fashion. While the world is interested in weighing against each other “partisan” historians like Mommsen and Ferrero, and has rejoiced in the modern French school of historians because they know how to write, the English school of “scientific” history has lost all the influence over the public mind which was once possessed by their “literary” predecessors, whom they have laid under the ban. Fortunately, there are the strongest signs in the Oxford school of history of a reaction against the “pure science” theory.

Signor Villari is not likely to be one of those who wish to exclude from history all that is of emotional or ethical value, for he is an Italian, and the main subject-matter of historical scholarship in that country is the Risorgimento, the story of the resurrection of Italy from utter death to noble life, the memory of which has kept Italy half-alive during the last generation of disillusionment, and is in our day re-inspiring her to a fresh and more steady vigour.

But all the eminent Italian students of the present day, and among them Signor Villari, have learnt their lesson from Germany and from science, and do not respect scholarship less because they refuse to sacrifice at its shrine all that ennoble the life of man.

“The poet,” he says, “can embody his ideas in a semblance of reality; the historian must employ his ideas as a means of discovering the truth of facts; he has to seek the reality of his theme, whereas the poet may create it.” (p. 14.)

This is excellently put, and is opposed to the “mere science” view, which denies anything at all in common between the reality of poetry and the reality of history. It is curious to observe that the really great German historians, who are supposed to have invented the scientific method, held views indistinguishable from those of Signor Villari. Ranke declared that “the function of history will always be to relate ‘events just as they occurred, defining their value and their meaning’” (p. 108). The last part of the sentence admits the whole contention of those who would introduce ethics and emotion into history, for events have no “value” and little enough “meaning” without ethics and emotion. Nor, without the literary art, can their “value” be expressed. Gregorovius, too, as we read in his “Roman Journal” (p. 362, English translation), held the same views as to the need of “imagination” in the historian; “imagination” he declared to be “the gift that constitutes the historical enquirer, and creates the work of art.”

The shorter essays in Signor Villari’s volume are studies of Cavour (in youth), Luigi Settembrini, Francesco De Sanctis, and Domenico Morelli, and also of Donatello and Savonarola. English readers, who do not know Countess Martinengo Cesaresco’s excellent life of Cavour, or her essay on Settembrini, in “Italian Characters,” will find what is to them new matter in Signor Villari’s essays, but they are rather out of date for professed students, especially as the essay on Settembrini was written before his Ricordanze appeared. But the article on Francesco De Sanctis is most interesting. We cannot do better than quote Signor Villari on the state of literary criticism as De Sanctis found it in the ‘fifties of the last century, and the nature of his remedial work:—

“The system of criticism then prevailing in Italy was still at the same stage as in the years preceding 1848—that is to say, it was a patriotic system, demanding that poetry, history, science, and letters should have a ‘civile,’ i.e., patriotic, aim. All literature, in fact, was to pave the way for the emancipation of the country. Arnaldo da Brescia had to use the language of an anti-clerical of the present day; Giovanni da Procida that of a disciple of Mazzini; while the histories of Greece and Rome were to afford continual lessons in patriotism, and the footnotes to Greek and Latin classics to supply perpetual allusions to the liberation of Italy, even at the cost of misinterpreting the text.”

This sort of thing

“did excellent service in preparing the way for the events of 1848, which afforded so many proofs, not only of patriotism, but also of heroic bravery, though not, alas! of an equal amount of good sense. But after 1850 it was no longer necessary to use artificial devices for teaching patriotism to a people who had so eagerly shed their blood in its cause. The main question, rather, at that date, was how best to train the national intelligence and the rising generation to discern the real gist of events, and to make more effectual preparations for the new struggle that was foreseen to be inevitable, although under different conditions from those of the previous attempt. The political freedom established in Piedmont and the tactful sobriety of the Piedmontese people urged all Italy to follow the path thus traced out.” (p. 173-4.)

To amend this situation, De Sanctis was the man needed.

“If De Sanctis had not cleared the ground of innumerable rhetorical and patriotic misconceptions, of innumerable empty formulas and rules, scientific criticism could not have made such enormous progress among us. The independence of art had first to be proclaimed, the history and laws of the human mind had first to be discovered in the personal work of men of genius before it could be possible, by means of a sure method, to discover the same laws in the impersonal work of the masses. This task had been already performed in Germany, where the new criticism first came into being."

* “Studies Historical and Critical.” By Pasquale Villari. Translated by Linda Villari. T. Fisher Unwin. 15s net.

"De Sanctis was a true awakener and deliverer of the national spirit, a vigorous apostle of political liberty and free thought, which were one and the same thing in his eyes. This was his real mission, and constitutes his historical value. But the chief means that enabled him to reach his chosen aim was the genuine critical power that assures him so lofty a niche in the history of Italian literature." (p. 199.)

Equally interesting are Signor Villari's remarks on the effect of Leopardi, the poet of pessimism and utter despair, in awakening the youth of Italy in the 'thirties and 'forties of the century to hope and vigour. Leopardi had all the "desperate scepticism and sadness of a man whom constant illness had robbed of his youth and reduced to premature decay; of a man to whom nature seemed a stepmother and the world a band of rascals bent on crushing all who were honest." (p. 183.)

And yet Leopardi's "poetry of despair changed in our hearts into a song of hope. For it was the image of buried Italy struggling to rise from the grave" (p. 183). The most famous of Leopardi's lines well illustrate how this happened. "I see the arches and the towers" (of Italy), he wrote, "but the glory I do not see—ma la gloria non vedo." He wrote these lines and died, and within not many years Italy could boast to the world the "glory" of Mazzini's, Garibaldi's, and Cavour's lives, and of how many thousand noble deaths!

OUR CITY GARDENS.*

This book deals with the past and the present of the parks, squares, and gardens, public and private, of London "within the official boundaries of the London County Council at the present time." It might have been better arranged, and shortened by the omission of a good many obvious reflections; but, on the whole, it is a good book, written with zest though with no great skill, and full of curious information. At any rate, it is interesting to read, and most Londoners will find in it much that is worth knowing and that they do not know. London in the later Middle Ages was a city of gardens, most of them private, and it was, even more than it is now, a city of contrasts, with squalor and turmoil and insecurity close round the walls of the peaceful gardens of monasteries and palaces. Vine Street, Mrs. Cecil tells us, is called after the Bishop of Ely's vineyard in Ely Place, where very sour wine was made, and in the Earl of Lincoln's garden close by there was an orchard. Many of the monastic gardens disappeared at the Reformation with other things good and bad. Those who rail at the utilitarian greed of modern times are usually unaware that the greed of the past was just as great and not even utilitarian. In the reign of Henry VIII., if a powerful courtier had no taste for gardens, he destroyed any garden which he got out of the pillage of the Church. If he had a taste for gardens he very likely took those of his neighbours by force. Mrs. Cecil quotes from Stowe an account of the methods of Thomas Cromwell. He built a house for himself in the city, and then "caused the pales of the gardens adjoining to the north part thereof on a sudden to be taken downe, 22 feet to be measured forthright into the north of every man's ground, a line then to be drawn, a trench to be cast, a foundation laid, and an high bricke wal to be builded. . . . No man durst goe to argue the matter, but each man lost his land." The chief of our parks have been preserved because they belonged to the Crown. But Hyde Park and the land that is now Regent's Park were almost lost to the public under the Commonwealth. They were declared the property of the Commonwealth, but only so that they might be sold; for in 1649, three days after Hyde Park had been thrown open to the public, it was put up to auction in three lots. Regent's Park, then called Marylebone Park, was a Royal hunting ground in Henry VIII.'s reign. It remained Crown property though it was often leased to private persons. Cromwell sold it for £13,000, and the trees were cut down, some of them being used for the navy. No doubt excuses might be made for the utilitarian zeal of the Commonwealth, but it might have been very disastrous to the future of London, more disastrous even than in the case of the sale of Charles I.'s pictures. With the Restoration the two parks were resumed by the Crown, and so preserved for the eventual enjoyment of the nation.

Different phases of taste in gardening have left their mark upon the older parks. It is interesting to find that the extreme formality of Dutch gardening was distasteful to the English even when their own gardens were usually formal. Marvell protested against it in some pretty verses, and twenty-five years after William III. had laid out Kensington Gardens a writer, quoted by Mrs. Cecil, said that Dutch pleasure gardens were stuffed too thick with box, and that "they used it to a fault, especially in England, where we abound in so much good grass and gravel." No doubt the mania for landscape gardening, which did so much mischief in the eighteenth century and later, was a reaction against the Dutch fashion. The Serpentine, in its very name, is a protest against formality. St. James's Park was mainly laid out according to its present plan in about 1827 by Eyton, and we can get some idea of how strong the rage against formality then was from the words of a contemporary, who spoke of the work as "the best obliteration of avenues" that had ever been done. There was, he said, "a tremendous destruction of fine elms," but it was necessary for the designer to display his "astounding ingenuity." These landscape gardeners were regular Jacobins in their art, but their return to nature began before Rousseau; and about 1770 a Frenchman said that in St. James's Park "nature appears in all its rustic simplicity." But whatever old beauties were destroyed, we cannot complain of the present result. Nowhere has the English passion for rus in urbe expressed itself so happily as in St. James's Park. Nowhere has it expressed itself so unhappily as in most of the London squares. Mrs. Cecil tries to say what she can for them; but there is little to be said. Mr. Bernard Shaw might take them as a text for a sermon upon the mischief of romanticism, for their ugliness is all the result of a refusal to face realities. You cannot shut out London from a London square, and the effort to do so has ended in most cases in despairing apathy. Squares are the worst places in the world for landscape gardening, and yet nearly all of them have been "landscaped," with the result that nothing will grow in them except the dullest kind of shrubs, which shut out light and air just where they are not needed. Some day, perhaps, a little "fundamental brainwork" will be spent upon these desolate places, and then it will be seen that formality is the only remedy for them. At present with their belt of grimy shrubs they provide a mock privacy which nobody can enjoy, or even pretend to enjoy. Mrs. Cecil protests, and rightly, against the monotony of design in most of our parks. They are too often laid out according to the "landscape" fashions of the last century, which were an unhappy compromise between nature and art. She suggests, and rightly, that part should be really wild, and part really formal. The landscape combination of shrubbery and flower border prevents the flowers from growing well and the shrubs from looking natural.

Still, there is more to be proud of than to grumble at in the gardening of our parks, and it improves every year. It is often supposed that all the bedding-out in Hyde Park is done by nurserymen. But this is not so. Near the Ranger's Lodge, as Mrs. Cecil says, "a series of glass-houses on the most approved plan and rows of frames have been erected. There the bulbs are stored, and masses of wallflowers, delphiniums, and all the hardier bedding plants and those for the herbaceous borders are grown." There, too, in the largest house are kept the great palm trees, which in summer are planted out in different places, as, for instance, outside the National Gallery. Thus the gardening of our parks, though necessarily much more expensive than country gardening, is not made more expensive than it need be by being farmed out. This, of course, is Socialism of a very insidious kind, Socialism directly injurious to that great gardening industry with which all that is best and purest in our family life is so closely connected. But we forget ourselves. This is a review, not a leading article in a Tory newspaper.

* "London Parks and Gardens." By the Hon. Mrs. Evelyn Cecil. With Illustrations by Lady Victoria Manners. Constable. 21s. net.

THE GROUPING OF FLOWERS.*

CONSCIENTIOUS reviewing is always labour; not seldom pain, not often bliss. The present reviewer is fortunate in being entrusted with a task that might have been placed in more competent but not more appreciative hands. Miss Waterfield and her band of merry men and women have produced a book of consummate skill and rare beauty. To see it is joy; to review it, a patch of blue sky in the drab. Careful examination of the fifty-six sketches in colour, from the hand of Miss Waterfield herself, exhibits the fundamental simplicity of the principle that underlies the problem of colour in the good garden. Colour is not a material existence, it is a sensation. We learn in our youth the elementary laws of light waves in the ether of space, but forget them in the arrangement of our gardens. Miss Waterfield's impressionist sketches of colour groups compel us to recognise the essential importance of observing the rules that govern the relation of one colour to another. At least two-thirds of the best effects in Miss Waterfield's book are produced by the colours at the red end of the spectrum. The extreme visible red in the rainbow is produced by about three hundred and ninety-two billion vibrations per second. Violet vibrations are nearly twice as many. Green in its myriad shades being the canvas of the wise man's colour garden, the group of reds, which fortunately are obtainable in quantities from the hardest flowers, are easily and effectively projected against the curtain or canvas of greenery. We cannot discover in this magnum opus any definite composition suitable to the cottage or villa garden for a scheme of red against green, which is the easiest effect of all to produce. The book, of course, is written for great gardeners with great gardens at their disposal. It is scarcely intended for little folk. Still, the little folk may enjoy even a snippet from behemoth, and we could easily give a list of twelve hardy flowers for a crimson border that the slenderest purse could obtain, and the multi-millionaire envy.

Mr. Frank Galsworthy's chapter on roses reveals the true rosarian spirit. He is original without wildness, and properly mindful of the elusive element of perfume for which some gardeners have no more love than a fox hunter. We are struck with his practical advice in such a matter as providing permanent support for each pole for climbers at the outset. Should the pole rot at the base after a few years when the roses are climbing about it, much difficulty is found in renewing it owing to the tangled masses of growth. Miss Lawless deals, as she only can, with Irish memories of the gardens of Ireland. Scottish and Cornish gardens are described by Miss Waterfield, Mr. Graham Sterling, and Mr. Fitzherbert. Four delightful chapters on spring blossoms arrest the lover of flowers, and would compel Ulysses himself to own that there is no such beauty to be found in foreign lands as the fair gardens of England can boast. Talk of the Gorgeous East! It is a fraud. The present writer has seen the scarlet masses of the Flamboyant tree in the tropics at a distance of nine miles, while the Bouganvillea that grows in the Quinta gardens of Madeira are visible long before the Cape steamer anchors in Funchal Bay. Tours de force like the Flamboyant in Ceylon, the Hydrangea in Mr. Rhodes' garden on Table Mountain, the climbing plants at Madeira, or the spring flowers of the Alps, may not be found in the British Islands, but the peach and the almond, the magnolia and cherry, apple and pear blossoms, to say nothing of the Prunus Pissadi Philadelphus, tree peonies, and, above all, the new Delphiniums, which have increased the gaiety of nations, are without rivals abroad.

In the chapters on summer flowers there is fine reading, not only for information, but for the true gardening spirit exhaled from every line. Mr. Arnott's championship of the lily is notable, though even he scarcely gives her due to the Himalayan Lilium Giganteum—the monarch of the tribe. To describe the book as sumptuous is like calling a sunset nice. Being written by men and women it has its limitations, but none the less its fortunate possessor will feel that in one direction at least he has tasted the sweets of a liberal education. It is said that the true gardener must be both old and selfish—but this book shows that the treatment of colour grouping at least may breathe the spirit of youth and charity.

THE FRENCH CONSTITUTIONAL BISHOPS.*

SINCE Dr. Pisani is an orthodox Roman Catholic priest, and, indeed, a Canon of Paris, it cannot be expected that he should sympathise with or approve the Civil Constitution of the Clergy; naturally, he regards the Constitutional Church as a Gallican schism and those who adhered to it as deplorably misguided, however sincere and well-intentioned they may have been. But his personal standpoint, which he never conceals, only brings into relief his judicial impartiality in dealing with facts and his unswerving devotion to historical accuracy; and it makes the tributes which the facts compel him to pay to the genuine piety, the high character and the lofty motives of many of the Constitutionals (notably of Grégoire and Le Coz, the leading spirits of the movement) all the more convincing and unimpeachable. His book is one of the most valuable contributions to the history of the Constitutional Church that has yet been published. He has gone to original sources for his information, and those sources include the correspondence of Grégoire, the whole of which has been preserved and was placed at the author's disposal by its present owner, M. Gazier, the well-known professor of the Sorbonne.

One has only to read Dr. Pisani's introduction and compare it, for instance, with the article on the Civil Constitution in the "Catholic Dictionary" (on many subjects a trustworthy book of reference), to see how the facts have been distorted by partisan rancour. Dr. Pisani at once dismisses the view that the Civil Constitution was "an artificial conception, bred in the brains of a few Jansenists, matured in secret conclaves, and imposed by Machiavellian intrigues on a France quivering with indignation." Such a view commends itself only to those who never look for natural causes or take the trouble to investigate facts; the same persons will tell you that modern anti-clerical legislation has been imposed on an indignant nation of thirty-eight million Catholics by the Machiavellian intrigues of twenty-five thousand Freemasons. Dr. Pisani, being an historian who uses historical methods, is less naïf; he sees that the Civil Constitution was the inevitable result of the conditions which existed before the Revolution. The "lower clergy," half-starved and seething with discontent, threw themselves for the most part into the revolutionary movement, and in 1789 demanded redress for their legitimate grievances. Their attitude towards the Bishops was that of the peasants towards the noblesse; the Bishops were a caste apart, every ecclesiastical dignity and every valuable benefice was conferred on members of noble families and Court favourites; the Church property was shamelessly misappropriated, and Bishops, abbots and priors lived in luxury while the parish priests could hardly keep body and soul together. And, as Dr. Pisani says, the "lower clergy" suffered not only in their pocket but also in their amour-propre by reason of their exclusion from high office. Moreover, the French Church at the end of the eighteenth century was Gallican to the core, and the Civil Constitution was but an application of Gallican principles to the changed conditions. The traditional rights of the sovereign, recognised, however unwillingly, by the Papacy, were naturally transferred to the people, and popular election took the place of royal appointment. This change, like the abolition of Papal institution of Bishops and the limitation of absolute episcopal authority by the consultative councils of presbyters, was only a reversion to an earlier state of things. The chief objects of the Civil Constitution were the better distribution of ecclesiastical revenues and the opening of the higher offices in the Church to all the clergy. In return for the surrender of Church property, the Assembly treated the clergy with great liberality. The excessive incomes of the Bishops were reduced, but the parochial clergy have never been so well paid in the history of France either before or since.

There can be no doubt that the Civil Constitution reflected the feeling of the nation and of the majority of the

* "Flower Grouping, in English, Scotch, and Irish Gardens." Notes, and 56 Sketches in Colour, by Margaret Waterfield. Dent. 21s. net.

* "Répertoire Biographique de l'Episcopat Constitutionnel (1791-1802)." Par Paul Pisani. Paris: Alphonse Picard & Fils. 7 fr. 50.

HODDER AND STOUGHTON invite the attention of readers of "The Nation" to the following list of new and forthcoming publications. They will be pleased to forward post free to any address in the United Kingdom particulars of any or all of the books mentioned.

THEOLOGICAL AND RELIGIOUS.

JERUSALEM. The Topography, Economics, and History from the Earliest Times to 70 A.D. By the Rev. Prof. GEORGE ADAM SMITH, D.D., LL.D. With Illustrations and Maps. Two Volumes. Price 24s. net.

EXPOSITIONS OF HOLY SCRIPTURE. By the Rev. ALEXANDER MACLAREN, D.D., D.Lit. To be completed in 30 Volumes. The Fourth Series (Six Volumes) comprises:—(1) The Book of Psalms Vol. I.; (2) The Book of Psalms Vol. II.; (3) The Minor Prophets; (4) St. Luke Vol. I.; (5) St. Luke Vol. II.; (6) Epistle to the Romans. Price 24s. net the Series. Separate Vols. 7s. 6d.

THE ACTS OF THE HOLY GHOST. By the Very Rev. FRANCIS PIGOU, D.D., Dean of Bristol. Price 6s.

THE PHILOLOGY OF THE GREEK BIBLE. Its Present and Future. By the Rev. Prof. ADOLF DEISSMANN, D.D. Price 3s. net.

JEREMIAH. The Man and His Message. By J. R. GILLIES. Price 6s.

SOCIALITY, SOCIALISM AND THE CHURCH. By the Rev. P. T. FORSYTH, D.D. Price 1s. net.

BELLES LETTRES,

IBSEN. By EDMUND GOSSE. A new volume of "Literary Lives," edited by W. Robertson Nicoll. With photographic frontispiece and numerous illustrations. Price 3s. 6d.

UNFOREGONE CONCLUSIONS. By Lady GORDON. Price 6s.

THE RED REIGN. The True Story of an Adventurous Year in Russia. By KELLOGG DURLAND. With Illustrations. Price 7s. 6d. net.

THE TRAGEDY OF KOREA. By F. A. MACKENZIE. With Illustrations from Photographs. Price 6s.

THROUGH A PEER GLASS. A Lively Satire of the House of Lords. By ARTHUR WAGHORNE. With many Cartoons by DAVID WILSON. Price 6s.

MOTOR TOURS IN WALES AND THE BORDER COUNTIES. By Mrs. RODOLPH STAWELL. With 64 Illustrations. Price 6s. net.

SOME BRITISH BIRDS. Edited by EDWARD THOMAS. With 12 Plates in Colour. Price 5s. net.

NATURE RAMBLES IN LONDON. By K. M. HALL, F.L.S. With an Introduction by BEATRICE HARRADEN and over 100 Illustrations from Photographs by HENRY IRVING. Price 3s. 6d. net.

HOLLAND SKETCHES. By EDWARD PENFIELD. Illustrated in colour. Price 10s. net.

A JOURNEY INTO THE OCCULT. By BECKLES WILLSON. With an Introduction by Prof. FARRERT. Price 3s. 6d.

A. J. GORDON. A Biography. By his Son, ERNEST B. GORDON. Price 6s.

FICTION AND GENERAL.

PEARL OF PEARL ISLAND. By JOHN OXENHAM. Illustrated from Photographs. Price 6s.

DEEP MOAT GRANGE. By S. R. CROCKETT. With Illustrations. Price 6s.

THE RUGGED PATH. By CHARLES GARVICE. A Novel of Incident. Price 6s.

THE WORLD'S AWAKENING. A Story of the World's War of 1920. By NAVARCHUS. With Maps. Price 6s.

HER BESETTING VIRTUE. By MARY STUART BOYD. With Frontispiece in Colour by A. S. BOYD. Price 6s.

ANNE HYDE. By ANNIE S. SWAN. Illustrated. Price 3s. 6d.

THIRTEEN NIGHTS. By Mrs. ARCHIBALD MACKIRDY. Price 3s. 6d. net.

THE ANALYSED BIBLE. By the Rev. G. CAMPBELL MORGAN, D.D. Vol. I.—General Review of Genesis to Esther. Vol. II.—General Review of Job to Malachi. Vol. III.—General Review of the New Testament. To be followed by separate volumes analysing each book of the Bible. The whole series to be completed in about 40 Volumes. Special prospectus on application. Price 3s. 6d. each Volume.

FIRST PRINCIPLES OF CHRISTIAN CITIZENSHIP. By the Rev. ALBERT SWIFT. With Preface by the Rev. G. CAMPBELL MORGAN, D.D. Price 2s. 6d. net.

CHRISTIAN IDEALS. Sermons Preached on Special Occasions. By J. G. SIMPSON, M.A. Price 6s.

THE MAN OF SORROWS. By the Rev. J. R. MILLER, D.D. With Illustrations in large Rembrandt Photogravure by Modern Painters from the life of Christ. Price 2s. net.

THE CRITICAL AND EXPOSITORY BIBLE CYCLOPÆDIA. By the Rev. Canon A. R. FAUSSET, D.D. Illustrated with 600 Woodcuts. New and Cheaper Edition, price 3s. 6d. net. Prospectus on application.

BIOGRAPHY, Etc.

THE HISTORY OF BABYLONIA AND ASSYRIA. By Prof. HUGO WINCKLER, Ph.D. Translated and Edited by Prof. JAMES ALEXANDER CRAIG, Ph.D. With Maps. Price 6s. net.

MY FATHER. An Aberdeenshire Minister, 1812-1891. By W. ROBERTSON NICOLL. Price 2s. 6d.

THE USEFUL KNOWLEDGE LIBRARY. New Editions. Profusely illustrated. Price 1s. net each.

(1) The Stars. By G. F. CHAMBERS, F.R.A.S. (2) The Mind. By Prof. J. M. BALDWIN. (3) Forest and Stream. By JAMES RODWAY, F.L.S. (4) Architecture. By P. L. WATERHOUSE. (5) The Religions of the World. By E. D. PRICE, F.G.S. (6) Plant Life. By GRANT ALLEN.

THE THIN PAPER CLASSICS. New Editions. Cloth, 3s. net; Limp Lambskin, 3s. 6d. net each.

(1) Don Quixote. (2) The Poems of Percy Bysshe Shelley. (3) The Vision of Dante. (4) The Works of Charles Lamb. (5) The Tales of Edgar Allan Poe.

THE GREAT ARTIST SERIES. New Editions. With over 50 Plates in Monochrome, each separately mounted. Price 1s. net each volume.

(1) Botticelli. By RICHARD DAVEY. (2) Raphael. By EDGUMBE STALEY. (3) Constable's Sketches. By Sir JAMES D. LINTON, R.I. (4) Burne-Jones (First Series). By MALCOLM BELL. (5) Dante Gabriel Rossetti. By ERNEST RADFORD.

THE "AT HOME" SERIES. New Volumes published at 5s. net each. Profusely illustrated.

(1) Norway at Home. By the Rev. T. B. WILLSON. (2) New Zealand at Home. By the Hon. R. A. LOUGHNAN, M.L.C. (3) South Africa at Home. By R. FULLER. (4) America at Home. By MAURICE LOW. (5) Germany at Home (New Edition). By W. H. DAWSON.

TABLES OF STONE. By HAROLD BEGBIE. Price 6s.

THE HOUSE OF THE LOST COURT. By the MARQUESA D'ALPENS. Price 6s.

JOSEPH REDHORN. By J. J. BELL. With Frontispiece. Price 5s.

SPEAKING RATHER SERIOUSLY. By W. PETT RIDGE. With Portrait. Price 2s. 6d. net.

CONFESSIONS OF A TRADESMAN. By FRANK T. BULLEN. Price 6s.

SARAH'S MOTHER. By L. T. MEADE. Price 6s.

THE HATE FLAME. By PERCY BARRON. Price 6s.

DIANA AND DESTINY. By CHARLES GARVICE. New and Cheap Edition. Price 3s. 6d.

clergy. The opposition to it was for the most part political rather than religious. It is true that the Bishops, with four exceptions, refused to take the oath which a man like M. Emery was able to take, but in the majority of cases their refusal was not due to fidelity to the papacy or to dislike of Gallican principles. They were actuated rather by dislike of democracy and the Revolution, and, above all, of the diminution in their incomes and prestige which was effected by the Civil Constitution. How far the majority of them were from possessing an apostolic spirit or burning zeal for religion is shown by the fact that they emigrated (in many cases before they were even in any danger), and left their flocks to the mercy of the wolves. In the security of English soil they joined in plots against their own country, and by all their actions showed that they were nobles first of all. It is probable that their opinions were no less Gallican than those of the Constitutionals.

TWO COLOUR BOOKS.*

THE text of the average "colour book" is notoriously dry and dull. There is a theory that publications of this class are produced for the sake of the illustrations alone, and that the reading matter does not greatly signify so long as it answers the purpose of filling up the intervening spaces with clean and legible type; hence, in regard to literary quality, the colour book is too often trivial and ill-constructed, a guide book without the solid advantages of that useful article, masquerading in a gorgeous fancy dress. One therefore welcomes any effort in a new direction, such as is afforded by the volume on Liverpool, painted by Mr. J. Hamilton Hay and described by Mr. Dixon Scott. Here, at any rate, we have what is rare in colour book compilation, a certain bond of sympathy between artist and author, an impressionistic outlook common to both, and, on the latter's part, a definite attempt to supplement and expound in words the meaning of the pictures. Mr. Hay's illustrations are wholly admirable in colour, tone, draughtsmanship, and variety of treatment; he has drawn the details of Liverpool and pictured her general effects with a peculiar intimacy that bespeaks far more than a casual sketcher's acquaintance with the city. And Mr. Scott has done his best to write up to the spirit of these drawings. It is no bare record of facts that he gives us, but a series of fluent word pictures imbued with a strongly personal note and enlivened by gleams of fancy—word pictures painted with a bold and facile brush, always ambitious in their conception, often triumphant in their results, ranging from things seen to things imagined across a wide domain of thought, but on the whole well controlled by one or two dominating ideas. Mr. Scott sees Liverpool, first of all, as a living organism of which the spirit, or genius, is the River Mersey. To him the influence of the great waterway "drenches the local atmospheres, private, social, civic, with a distinctive colour. It is revealed in the nature of the men in her streets, and in the nature of the streets about the men. It is the deciding element in that inherent spirit of the place which those men and those streets at once prefigure and evoke, and which it is the main purpose of this book, with the aid of those men and streets, to attempt in some measure to enclose." He sees the city, secondly, as "an all but fully unfurled fan," and makes use of the simile in following its scheme to the uttermost ramifications. He records his impressions (1) as the artist only concerned with the visual aspect of what he sees, (2) as the thinker probing its inner significance, and (3) as the sociologist intent upon sifting the humanity that helps to make, and reflects, the psychology of the city itself. Of historical retrospect there is little in this book. Indeed, as the author justly points out, Liverpool has no history to speak of. Although this year witnesses the sept-centenary of the original "serfs' charter," which gave the borough its identity, the town had no importance until the time of its rise on the wave of the industrial revolution towards the end of the eighteenth century. Previous to that, it was of less consequence even than some of its own suburbs.

The author's enthusiasm for his subject is infectious, and in his style—a most difficult one to sustain—there are only a few minor blemishes. One of the latter is the tendency to use an exotic phrase when a normal one would answer the purpose quite as well; "to realise with a stound" is an instance of the unusual that catches one's breath rather painfully. And surely fancy becomes ultra fanciful on p. 27 where, at sight of a hill of cotton bales or a heap of grain, "you begin to envision the anæmic spinster who will one day wrap herself in some part of that sodden mound, or the white hen, in some dreamful farmyard, that will one day peck this grain." The sequence of thought is a little too whimsical to ring quite true. Yet, in the main, Mr. Scott steers his way through the realm of speculative inquiry and pretty paradox with vast ingenuity, and occasionally, as in his curiously penetrative study of the submerged tenth of Liverpool, exhibits some profounder qualities. We are not sure that he does not claim more individuality for Liverpool than she actually possesses, that some of the features that he finds distinctive of the town and its inhabitants are not shared by other towns and populations, that some of the paradoxes are not equally true, let us say, of the City of London. But this is almost inevitable, and Liverpool has her well-marked characteristics and her special problems—witness, among other things, her constant attention to the question of locomotion, and a system of philanthropy, the fruit of a common sense striving after efficiency, which has few equals in the country in regard to effective result. Of her visual beauties we have no space to speak, but Mr. Scott does not fail to impress them on the mind, and his word pictures of the arrival and departure of an ocean liner, of the tramway terminus at night, and of the approach to the city from the sea, are things to be remembered.

In "The Norwegian Fjords," where the artist is also the author, we discover a colour book of the old style. The preface disarms criticism of the literary contents by disclaiming any attempt to do more than state facts that may prove useful to the intending traveller; and—for compensation—refers the reader to the illustrations. We accordingly turn to these first and, truth to tell, find them of very uneven quality. A certain looseness and freedom of treatment give charm to a few of the collection; several resemble the proverbial curate's egg in being good in parts; others recall the picture postcard of the baser sort, raucous in colour to the point of vulgarity. The reproduction process may have something to do with the failures, but we are far from ascribing the latter entirely to this cause. Next, as to the text. The value of this is somewhat seriously impaired in the copy before us by the fact that after p. 120 the pages have been bound in the wrong order, and one or two appear to have been dropped altogether, while others are duplicated. However, after patient unravelling of the chaos thus created, one sees no reason to modify the impression produced by the earlier portion of the book, which is that it contains a good deal of information about the "land of the saeter," its geographical features, industries, sports, the constitution of its church, its system of education, and its domestic life, that is not found in the ordinary guide book. Neither are the facts as baldly stated as the modest preface would lead us to expect. The text, in a word, is quite good of its kind, and that its kind is not one that exactly inspires is an accident that reflects not at all upon the conscientiousness of the author's labour.

A BUNDLE OF NEW TALES.

"THE ANCIENT LAW," by Miss Ellen Glasgow (Constable, 6s.), is a volume of very considerable merit, sincerely felt, well thought out, and carefully executed. Its central theme—the effect upon character of prolonged imprisonment—is one with which the minds of a good many novelists appear to be occupied just now, but very few of them deal so tenderly and sympathetically with it. Possibly Miss Glasgow somewhat underestimates the brutalising influences of prison life, or possibly the influence of American prisons is not so injurious as that of English ones. Be this as it may, she succeeds in making Daniel Ordway not only real but dear to us. The very best part of the book is that in which he lives beside but apart from the family to which he by-and-by returns, and in which he is so completely an

* "Liverpool." Painted by J. Hamilton Hay. Described by Dixon Scott. Adam & Charles Black. Price, 6s. net.

* "The Norwegian Fjords." Painted and described by A. Heaton Cooper. Adam & Charles Black. Price, 6s. net.

NEW VOLUME BY THE AUTHOR OF
"THE DIFFICULT WAY."

NOW READY at all Libraries and Booksellers, 6s.

THE ALIEN SISTERS.

By Mrs. PERCY DEARMER.

Author of "The Difficult Way," "Brownjohn's," &c.

JUST PUBLISHED. Small Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

BRITISH SOCIALISM:

An Examination of its Doctrines, Policy, Aims, and Practical Proposals.

By J. ELLIS BARKER. Author of "Modern Germany,"
"The Rise and Decline of the Netherlands," &c.

LORD WANTAGE, V.C., K.C.B.

With 8 Portraits. A MEMOIR. By his WIFE. Large 8vo, 10s. 6d. net. Second Edition.

General Sir Henry Brackenbury, in Blackwood's Magazine, says: "A remarkable and deeply interesting book."

THE SOCIAL FETICH.

By LADY GROVE. Demy 8vo, 5s. net. Second Edition.

The Nation says: "Full of vivacity and pleasant illustration, and makes a very readable volume."

IDLEHURST: A JOURNAL KEPT IN THE COUNTRY.

By JOHN HALSHAM. New and Cheaper Edition.
Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

The Saturday Review, noticing the first edition, said: "'Idlehurst' is one of the most beautiful idylls in English."

BY THE SAME AUTHOR.

LONEWOOD CORNER: A COUNTRYMAN'S HORIZONS.

Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

Spectator.—"Idlehurst" quickly became a classic; 'Lonewood Corner' will stand beside it on most shelves where the earlier book has established its footing."

London: SMITH, ELDER & CO.

CASSELL & COMPANY'S

New Publications.

For AMATEURS & CONNOISSEURS.

Byways of Collecting.

By ETHEL DEANE.

Editor of 'The Queen.'

This volume gives very valuable information to Collectors of Prints, Porcelain, Pottery, Old Silver, Sheffield Plate, and Glass, and shows how to identify genuine articles, and how to avoid traps laid by unscrupulous dealers. The full-page and other illustrations are of some of the choicest specimens of private Collectors. With 73 Illustrations. 7s. 6d. net.

The Pauper of Park Lane

By WILLIAM LE QUEUX. 6s.

THE LIVERPOOL POST says: "Quite deliberately we say that this is the best wrought and most thrilling of Mr. Le Queux's books."

Vayenne

By PERCY J. BREBNER. 6s.

THE WESTERN DAILY PRESS: "Full of animation and vigour, the plot is ingenious in construction and clever in treatment."

Wheels of Anarchy.

By MAX PEMBERTON. 6s.

MORNING LEADER says: "A really surprising dénouement . . . continuously interesting and exciting."

The Lost Millionaire

By LILLIAS CAMPBELL DAVIDSON. 6s.

The authoress has woven mystery around the kidnapping of a baby millionaire with the craftsmanship for which she is well known, and has succeeded in getting a very exciting and convincing story.

The Seven of Hearts

By MAURICE LE BLANC. 6s.

The story of Arsène Lupin,—the man of thousand disguises, while baffling Ganimard, the great detective, and bringing off his great coups. It is told in an intensely dramatic manner.

Write for an Illustrated List of Spring Books.

CASSELL & Co., Ltd., La Belle Sauvage, LONDON.

MESSRS. BELL'S NEW BOOKS.

New Works by ABBOT GASQUET, D.D., O.S.B.
Just Published. Crown 8vo. 6s. net.

THE BLACK DEATH In 1348 and 1349.

New and Revised Edition.

"By far the most interesting and exhaustive record to be found of this most appalling visitation." Morning Post.

Ready next Wednesday. Crown 8vo. 6s. net.

THE LAST ABBOT OF GLASTONBURY, and other Essays. Illustrated.

The first essay here reprinted, "The Last Abbot of Glastonbury," was first published in 1885 as a separate volume, which has long been out of print. It gives an account of the destruction of the great Benedictine Abbeys of Glastonbury, Reading, and Colchester, and of the tragic deaths of the last abbots of those houses in the reign of Henry VIII. The other essays in the volume are collected from various magazines, and have not previously appeared in book form.

In the Press. Crown 8vo.

THE OLD ENGLISH BIBLE, and other Essays.

Prospectus on application.

LES CLASSIQUES FRANÇAIS ILLUSTRÉS.

Publiés sous la direction de DANIEL O'CONNOR. Small crown 8vo, with 8 Full-page Illustrations in Colour and about 30 in Black and White. 5s. net.

NOW READY.

GEORGE SAND: LES MAÎTRES SONNEURS.

Préface d'EMILE FAGUET, de l'Académie Française.
Illustrations de M. V. WHEELHOUSE.

GEORGE SAND: LA MARE AU DIABLE.

Notice Analytique de C. A. SAINTE-BEUVE. Illustrations de GERTRUDE LEESE.

READY SHORTLY.

BALZAC: LES CHOUANS.

Illustrations de J. BLAKE GREENE.

Illustrated Prospectus on application.

Crown 8vo. 6s. net.

DECORATIVE HERALDRY.

A Practical Handbook of its Artistic Treatment.

By G. W. EVE. With about 200 Illustrations. New and Revised Edition.

"He treats his subject with a width as well as a depth of knowledge that renders this volume amongst all modern writings the treatise on heraldry par excellence for artists." Magazine of Art.

HANDBOOKS OF THE GREAT MASTERS IN PAINTING AND SCULPTURE.

CHEAPER RE-ISSUE.

With 40 Full-Page Illustrations and a Photogravure Frontispiece. Post 8vo, 3s. 6d. net each.

24 VOLUMES ALREADY PUBLISHED.

JUST PUBLISHED.

CARLO CRIVELLI. By G. McNEIL RUSHFORTH, M.A.

MANTEGNA. By MAUD CRUTTZWELL.

MICHAEL ANGELO.

By LORD RONALD SUTHERLAND-GOWER, M.A.

SODOMA. By the CONTESSA LORENZO PRIULI-BON.

Write for Illustrated Prospectus.

BOHN'S LIBRARIES.

"The new series of Bohn's Libraries, on which judicious book-buyers have long learned to keep a careful eye."—ATHENÆUM.

NEW VOLUMES.

3 vols. Small crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. each.

RANKE'S HISTORY OF THE POPES DURING THE LAST FOUR CENTURIES.

Translated by E. FOSTER. New and Revised Edition, with considerable Additions.

Small post 8vo, 3s. 6d.

MIGNET'S HISTORY OF THE FRENCH REVOLUTION, from 1789 to 1814.

"Mignet's striking if not wholly impartial history of the Revolution—perhaps the best short history."—ATHENÆUM.

Small post 8vo, 5s.

LUCRETIIUS. A Prose Translation.

By H. A. J. MUNRO. Reprinted from the Final (Fourth) Edition. With an Introduction by J. D. DUFF, M.A.

"It is not only a most faithful rendering of the original but a remarkable literary achievement. Munro's edition, and still more, his translation, are not superseded, and it is probable that they never can be."—Mr. DUFF's Introduction.

LONDON:

GEORGE BELL & SONS, York House, Portugal St., W.C.

alien. In particular the portrait of the wife (whom scarcely one writer in a hundred would have resisted exaggerating) has extraordinary subtlety and truth. The novelist who can see as keenly and present as deftly as this possesses the most essential parts of her art. In virtue of these pages Miss Glasgow may be forgiven even for suffering her New York printers to defy the shade of Calverley by printing "forever" instead of "for ever."

* * *

THERE seems at first sight no reason why an American author should be less successful than a British one in the writing of a medieval tale. But a perusal of "Beatrix of Clare," written by John Reed Scott, and published in England by E. Grant Richards (6s.), seems to suggest that we Britons are, after all, a good deal nearer to feudal times and manners. The heroine who gives her name to the volume is a lady in attendance upon Richard the Third's wife, but her manner with her admirers is precisely that of an American girl at some fashionable resort; the balcony of a Swiss hotel seems to rise around her as she speaks; we can almost distinguish the colour of her parasol. And, indeed, a parasol would hardly be a more surprising adjunct than the lace pocket handkerchief which she displays on various occasions, and finally bestows upon her favourite suitor. Well might the young gentleman prize such a rarity. He, on his part, by way of informing a Yorkshire abbot that the county is unknown to him, says: "I have never seen this section until to-day." "Section," we murmur to ourselves, "section!" And Aymer de Lacy is transformed at once into a young man on a business expedition, a young man wearing a loose grey suit and speaking with an American accent.

* * *

CURIOUS are the waves of similarity that come over groups of contemporary stories. Just now there is a run upon the beautiful, absolutely heartless, and absolutely unprincipled woman. She is invariably represented as being extraordinarily attractive, and generally manages to wreck the lives of one or two madly devoted lovers, but in print she appears strangely dull, and in real life the dull woman is seldom observed to be fascinating, even when beautiful. Mr. W. Teignmouth Shore's heroine in "The Pest" (John Long, 6s.), is dull; in fact, she is worse than dull, for she is not alive at all. Thackeray, that most successful creator of bad women, never fell into the error of giving them vices only, instead of individuality. Becky Sharp, Beatrix Esmond, and Blanche Amory are all heartless and all pernicious; they are all, also (unlike the lady in "The Pest") intelligent; but these qualities are not the whole of them. So individual are all three that no reader can ever have forgotten even their names. If one of these women could but be set in the place of Marian Squire, what a fine novel "The Pest" might be. As it is, the reader rather wonders that any man thought it worth while to pay Marian's bills for her.

* * *

WHEN we see the name of Mr. Thomas Cobb on the cover of a book we know precisely what to expect within, and "The Chichester Intrigue" (John Lane, 6s.) fulfils precisely that expectation. The style is pleasant, easy, and educated; the plot amusing; the tone amiably ironic; and the personages sufficiently characterised to keep an intelligent reader interested in their doings. These items of commendation, thus enumerated, may seem, perhaps, to smack of the "faint praise" that notoriously condemns; but, at least, they suffice to place the author who can claim them well above two-thirds of the writers now producing fiction for the English market.

* * *

"CLEMENTINA'S HIGHWAYMAN" (Hurst & Blackett, 6s.) is a story of the year 1742, told by two authors in collaboration, Messrs. Robert Neilson Stephens and George Hembert Westley. Their work is clearly that of practised hands; the plot is good and the narrative runs along gaily. But of characterisation there is hardly a trace, and what there is belongs, oddly enough, not to the hero but to the hero's friend. The amateur highwayman himself and the young lady whom he rescues are mere lay figures, while Clementina's aunt and cousin, and the fine gentleman who attempts to abduct her, stand upon the yet lower plane of caricature. With the addition of character, this would have been an excellent novel of its class. As it is, the writers seem to have regarded their work with no sort of seriousness, and the reader receives it in the same spirit. A curious slip (that can hardly have been the printer's) appears on page 169, where the word "solicitation" is used instead of "solicitude."

* * *

How difficult it seems to be for the writer of a novel at the same time to take enough trouble and to avoid taking too much. Here is "Rodwell," now, by Miss Valentina Hawtrey (Murray, 6s.), a stout volume of 450 closely printed pages. At least a third of those pages are too many, and yet not one of them is slipshod or careless. The author has realised to herself her persons, her setting, and all her details. That, of course, is right; the error is that she has tried to convey all the details to us, and has thereby marred her effect. Literature is, above all, the art of selection, and the secret of successful selection is bold omission. The young author longs to tell everything; in youth all details are new. As we grow older we discover that, just as the value of our adjectives depends upon their rarity, so the effectiveness of our descriptions depends upon the largeness of their lines. But "Rodwell," although its execution is too laborious, is the sincere production of an able and honest observer; and every reader worth reckoning with will look out for the next story from its author.

* * *

"EVE'S APPLE," by Alphonse Courlander (Fisher Unwin, 6s.), is yet another picture of that lovely, pernicious, and altogether unlikable syren before whom the heroes of novels fall like ninepins. She has French blood in her—they are extremely apt to have foreign blood, these syrens—and a worthy man marries her, to his undoing. To supply money for her squandering, he speculates with funds of which he is a trustee; and although the cousin, who owns the money and who is in love with him, refuses to prosecute, he is bent upon going to prison, and succeeds in getting sent there. Whether "the Crown" really would or could, in such a case, "take the matter up," let lawyers decide. To the unregenerate average reader the incident seems to savour a little of comic opera. He serves his term, has an attack of brain fever, and, we are given to understand, will recover, to divorce the faithless Gabrielle, and marry the excellent Helen, who, thanks to the fraudulent investment's having meanwhile miraculously succeeded, is now three times as rich as she was originally. Is it possible that Mr. Courlander thinks he is writing about real life?

* * *

THE cover of Mr. John Dalison Hyde's novel, "Mrs. Maclean" (Sisleys, 6s.) is adorned by the photograph of a Parisian-looking lady in an unduly low-necked frock, and this cover is a very fair indication of the contents. Mrs. Maclean, née Julia Darley, is a young woman at once ill-bred, unprincipled, and unintelligent. Being, however, beautiful, with coppery hair and violet eyes, she has most of the men in the book at her feet, and is enabled to live in ease and idleness. Finally, when her conduct has driven her husband to suicide, and when her own beauty has been destroyed by the overturning of a motor-car, the birth of her child transforms her into quite a respectable person. A taint of vulgarity mars the book; the style is wooden, and the psychology untrue.

* * *

At intervals the seasoned reader grows inclined to cry out for a "close time" in literature. Certain themes do really need to enjoy periods of compulsory oblivion; and the very first to be thus prohibited should be that of the two men so alike that near relatives take the one for the other. "The Prisoner of Zenda" we all accepted; great is Mr. Hope's gifts of plausibility, and, besides, a breathless tempo carries one over many stumbling-blocks. At "John Chilcote" many of us began to demur, and Mr. Maurice Drake's "Lethbridge of the Moor" (Werner Laurie, 6s.) will surely snap our last thread of patience. It is really a pity. The early chapters of Lethbridge's history are so excellent. The release from prison and the adventures with bookmakers stand out memorable, a thoroughly good bit of presentation, sober and vital. But from the moment when the brother of a dishonest theatrical manager discerns in Lethbridge that felonious gentleman's double, the story goes to pieces. Thenceforward it is a fairy tale—and not a good one.

Mr. Edward Arnold's New Books

A New Novel by the author of "The Jungle."

THE METROPOLIS

BY
UPTON SINCLAIR,

Author of "The Jungle." 6s.

"The Metropolis" is a scathing exposure of the vicious and extravagant life led by the vulgar rich element in New York Society.

Ways of Rebellion

By REGINALD FARRER.

Author of "The Sundered Streams," "The House of Shadows," &c. 6s.

To be Published Next Week.

GEORGE RIDDING, Schoolmaster and Bishop. Forty-third Head Master of Winchester, 1866-1884; First Bishop of Southwell, 1884-1904. By his Wife, LADY LAURA RIDDING. Demy 8vo., with illustrations. 15s. net.

FROM THEIR POINT OF VIEW. By M. LOANE, Author of 'The Next Street but One,' 'The Queen's Poor,' etc. Crown 8vo. 6s.

NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION.

TURKEY IN EUROPE. By SIR CHARLES ELIOT, K.C.M.G. ('ODYSSEUS'). A New Edition, with Additional Chapters on Events from 1869 to the Present Day. Large Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.

London; EDWARD ARNOLD, 41 & 43, Maddox St., W.

From ROUTLEDGE'S LIST.

ASPECTS OF GEORGE MEREDITH. By RICHARD H. P. GURLE. With an Engraved Portrait after G. F. WATTS. Crown 8vo, cloth extra, 6s.

The Daily Telegraph :—"A distinguished and well-balanced piece of work, which should gain its author immediate recognition, as among the most sane and well-informed of the younger critics of the day."

Mr. W. M. ROSSETTI in The Daily News :—"I would advise any aspirant to the study of Meredith to read a book by Mr. Richard Gurle, very recently published, entitled 'Aspects of George Meredith.' It is the work of a convinced and penetrating admirer, and analyses a number of points highly deserving of being taken into consideration."

A RESIDENT'S WIFE IN NIGERIA. By CONSTANCE LARYMORE. With 41 Illustrations on Art Paper, and a Portrait of the Author. 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d. net.

The Globe :—"Mrs. Larymore is not only a skilled traveller in wild countries, but is able to describe her wanderings most graphically with pen and camera. One of the most enjoyable books of travel we have seen of late."

Liverpool Courier :—"Miss Kingsley has shown us that a woman can travel. . . Mrs. Larymore gives a further demonstration of the fact. . . In Miss Kingsley's book nothing is more striking than the good humour of the writer; Mrs. Larymore has the same fine gift of kindly optimism. A most engaging account of her life and experiences in Nigeria."

THE CASE FOR THE GOAT, with the Practical Experience of 24 Experts. By "HOME COUNTIES." With 16 Full-page Plates. Crown 8vo, cloth extra, 3s. 6d. Also, with 4 Full-page Plates, boards, 1s

The Lancet :—"Shows how easily anybody with no more accommodation than a backyard in the suburbs can become a keeper of live stock which will make him independent of the dairyman."

The Spectator :—"May be warmly recommended as containing much that is very likely to be useful."

Entirely Revised Edition (1907) with 268 Magnificent Coloured Figures and 245 Cuts.

FLOWERS OF THE FIELD. By Rev. C. A. JOHNS. Revised throughout by CLARENCE ELLIOTT. 8vo 7s. 6d. net.

"It has been found necessary to make many additions, and the Editor has done so in an admirable manner. The present-day naturalist is deeply indebted to the advance made in illustrating objects in their proper colours; this is where the present edition is SO SUPERIOR to ITS PREDECESSORS. It is the most comprehensive and useful book the botanist can desire."—Standard.

BIRDS AND THEIR NESTS AND EGGS, found in and near Great Towns. With over 100 Fine Photos by GEORGE VOS, B.A., M.B. In 2 independent vols., cloth, each 1s.

"We earnestly recommend this charmingly written and exceedingly practical little book. Dr. Vos has the knack of securing the birds in characteristic attitudes, and we cannot help admiring the untiring patience which he must possess to obtain such a fine collection. He writes in such a breezy, interesting manner that boys and girls will read it with ease and pleasure."—Schoolmaster.

THE ROMANCE OF THE SKY. By C. J. GRIFFITH. Illustrated, cloth, 1s. [Just Out.]
An admirable FIRST INTRODUCTION in ASTRONOMY for young readers.

GEORGE ROUTLEDGE and SONS, Limited, London.

THE "R.T.S." LIST.

THE DEARTH OF CONVERSIONS.
DO WE NEED OTHER METHODS?

Every Earnest Christian Worker should read

TAKING MEN ALIVE.

Studies in the Principles and Practice of INDIVIDUAL SOUL-WINNING.

By CHARLES GALLAUDET TRUMBULL.

Just Ready. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 256 pages. Price 2s. 6d.

THE QUIET MOMENTS SERIES.

New Issues. Bound in Smooth Sheepskin, f'cap 8vo, 1s. 6d. each net.
A Series of little Books on great themes, veritable gems of devout and cultured thought, full of Evangelical fervour, yielding food for mind and heart, and "admirably suited for the quieter moments of our busy and hurrying day."

J. H. JOWETT — Meditations for Quiet Moments. By the Rev. J. H. JOWETT, M.A.

DR. BARRETT — Musings for Quiet Hours. By the Rev. G. S. BARRETT, D.D.

J. D. JONES — The Way Into the Kingdom. By the Rev. J. D. JONES, M.A., B.D.

ELVET LEWIS — The Gates of Life. By the Rev. H. ELVET LEWIS.

CANON HOARE — Fruitful or Fruitless. By the Rev. Canon HOARE, M.A.

J. A. CLAPPERTON — Methods of Soul Culture. By the Rev. J. A. CLAPPERTON, M.A.

A BOOK FOR THE TIMES.

CAN WE TRUST THE BIBLE?

Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 2s. 6d. CONTENTS:

Is the Bible Inspired? By the Rev. HUBERT BROOKE, M.A.

Invulnerable Certainties. By the Rev. GEORGE HANSON, D.D.

Facts and "Facts." By the Rev. R. SINKER, D.D.

Discoveries Confirming the Old Testament. By the Rev. R. B. GIRDLESTONE, M.A.

Deuteronomy and the Higher Criticism. By the Rev. MATTHEW LEITCH, D.Litt., D.D.

Are the Gospels True? By the Rev. FRANK BALLARD, M.A., B.Sc., D.D.

SPRING-TIME BOOKS.

ADVENTURES IN BIRD-LAND.

A Book for Boys. By OLIVER G. PIKE, Author of "Home Life in Birdland," "Woodland, Field, and Shore," &c. With 90 Photographs taken direct from Nature by the Author and 100 Pen-Sketches by E. Richmond Paton. Cloth gilt, demy 8vo, 6s. net.

BY MEADOW, GROVE AND STREAM

An introduction to Nature Study. By HENRY HILTON BROWN, F.E.S. With two Folded Coloured Plates, Photogravure Frontispiece and 171 figures in Black and White, from Original Drawings by the Author. Large crown 8vo., cloth gilt, 3s. 6d.

BY-PATHS IN NATURE.

By FRANK STEVENS, Author of "Adventures in Pondland," &c. With 72 Illustrations. Crown 8vo., cloth gilt, 2s. 6d.

EVERY BOY'S BOOK OF BRITISH NATURAL HISTORY.

A Reliable Guide to British Wild-Life and Nature Photography. By W. PERCIVAL WESTELL, F.L.S. With an Introduction by the Right Hon. Lord Avebury. Large crown 8vo., cloth gilt, 3s. 6d.

FIFTY-TWO NATURE RAMBLES.

A Series of Open-Air Talks for Young People. By W. PERCIVAL WESTELL, F.L.S., M.B.O.U., Author of "Every Boy's Book of Natural History," etc. With five Coloured Plates from Drawings, and 100 other illustrations from Photographs. Large crown 8vo., cloth gilt, 3s. 6d.

HOME-LIFE IN BIRD-LAND.

By OLIVER G. PIKE, Author of "Woodland, Field, and Shore." With four Coloured Plates, and over 80 other illustrations from Photographs taken direct from Nature by the Author. Demy 8vo, cloth gilt, 6s. net.

HOW TO STUDY WILD FLOWERS.

By REV. GEORGE HENSLAW, M.A., F.L.S., &c., Author of "Plants of the Bible." New Edition, with 12 double-page Coloured Plates and 57 other illustrations. Cloth gilt, with coloured picture on cover, 2s. 6d.

WOODLAND, FIELD AND SHORE.

Wild Nature depicted with Pen and Camera. By OLIVER G. PIKE, Author of "In Bird-Land with Field Glass and Camera." With two Coloured Plates, and 101 Engravings of Birds, Animals, and Insects from Photographs taken direct from nature by the Author. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d.

LONDON:

The Religious Tract Society, 4, Bouverie Street, E.C.

NEW SPRING BOOKS.

CEYLON: The Paradise of Adam.

By CAROLINE CORNER. Demy 8vo. 10s. 6d. net.
A breezy and entertaining record of life in the "Paradise of Adam." In the many adventures narrated one gets a keen insight into the lives and characteristics of peoples beyond the pale and ken of the ordinary European in Ceylon.

THE KING'S GENERAL IN THE WEST.

Being the Life of Sir Richard Grenville, Baronet (1600-1659). By ROGER GRANVILLE, M.A., Sub-Dean of Exeter Cathedral. With Illustrations. Demy 8vo. (9 x 5½ inches.) 10s. 6d. net.

REMARKS ON THE CONDITION OF HUNTERS, THE CHOICE OF HORSES, AND THEIR MANAGEMENT.

By NIMROD. The Veterinary portion revised and brought up to date by FRANK TOWNEND BARTON, M.R.C.V.S. With numerous Illustrations. Demy 8vo. (9 x 5½ inches.) 10s. 6d. net.

APOLOGIA DIFFIDENTIS.

By W. COMPTON LEITH. Demy 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.
OBSERVER: "A human document . . . a literary achievement . . . full of subtle shades of thought, descriptive writing, suggestion, and human sympathy."

MODERNISM AND ROMANCE.

By R. A. SCOTT-JAMES. Demy 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.
The literature of every period is at one and the same time a mirror and a guide. Mr. Scott-James's study of MODERNISM AND ROMANCE aims at indicating the scope of these functions in the literature of our own day.

INTERLUDES AND POEMS.

By LASCELLES ABERCROMBIE. Crown 8vo. 5s. net.
STANDARD: "Unquestionably shows fine feeling and poetic touch."
TIMES: "Mr. Abercrombie has power and he has originality. His mind is fearless, rebellious, sinister. He quails at nothing, light-heartedly frolicking among the most tremendous ideas and emotions. His words pour hot from his pen . . . his power and his originality are beyond question. 'Interludes and Poems' is a remarkable work, and we shall look with peculiar anticipation for its successor."

THE RE-BIRTH OF RELIGION.

By Dr. A. S. CRAPSEY. Crown 8vo. 5s. net.
The conception of the universe expressed in the Catholic Creeds and the Protestant Confessions of Faith is not compatible with the Weltanschauung, which comes from scientific research. The creeds and confessions were the forms which the Christian religion necessarily assumed in the pre-scientific era. They are passing away with the era to which they belong. But the death of theology is the Re-birth of Religion.

GOYA.

An account of his Life and Works, with 600 Illustrations from his pictures, etchings, and lithographs. By ALBERT F. CALVERT. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt. 3s. 6d. net. [The "Spanish" Series.]

CLAUDE DEBUSSY.

By Mrs. FRANZ LIEBICH. Crown 8vo. 2s. 6d. net.
["Living Masters of Music."
Mrs. Liebich's critical and biographical account of the great composer appears at a particularly opportune moment, seeing that Debussy has just arrived in London and is conducting his own works at various concerts. His position in the present phase of modern music is clearly defined by the author and shown to be the outcome of a unique personality.

BRAHMS.

By H. C. COLLES. Foolscape 8vo. With Portrait. 2s. 6d. net.
["Music of the Masters" Series.]

A SHORT PRACTICE OF AURAL SURGERY.

For the use of Students and Practitioners. By J. ARNOLD JONES, M.B., Ch.B. (Vict.), F.R.C.S. (Ed.), formerly House Surgeon to the Royal Ear Hospital in London. Crown 8vo. 5s. net.
["The Practitioner's Handbooks."]

THREE NEW NOVELS.

THE FINANCES OF SIR JOHN KYNNEERSLEY.

By A. C. FOX-DAVIES, Author of "The Dangerville Inheritance," "The Mauleverer Murders," &c. Crown 8vo. 6s.

THE CHICHESTER INTRIGUE.

A Novel. By THOMAS COBB, Author of "Mrs. Erricker's Reputation," "The Dissemblers," &c. Crown 8vo. 6s.

LOVE AND THE IRONMONGER.

By F. J. RANDALL. Crown 8vo. 6s.

NOW READY.

MARCH NO.

THE ALBANY REVIEW.

This issue contains among other interesting features the following special articles—

The Censorship of Plays . . . Gilbert Cannan
Sinn Féin . . . Rev. J. Hannay
The Taxation of Land Values . . . Erik Givskov
The Limitations of Natural Selection . . . D. Dewar

At all booksellers and railway bookstalls. 2s. 6d. net.

JOHN LANE, The Bodley Head, London, W.

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS.

Just Published.

ENGLISH SOCIETY IN THE ELEVENTH CENTURY.

8vo. Essays in English Mediaeval History. By
16s. net. Dr. PAUL VINOGRADOFF.

FREDERIC WILLIAM MAITLAND.

8vo. Two Lectures and a Bibliography. By A. L.
2s. 6d. net. SMITH.

Spectator.—"This is a tribute of praise worthy of the man to whose memory it is paid—more it would not be possible to say. . . . No one could be better qualified to speak of his work than Mr. A. L. Smith. He knows it well, and he can appreciate it in a way that shows a real mastery of the subject. Whether he is speaking of the general temper of the man, or of special instances in which he brought an illuminating genius to bear on problems of history, he always puts the case with remarkable clearness."

BONAPARTISM.

8vo. Six Lectures delivered in the University of
3s. 6d. net. London. By H. A. L. FISHER.

United Service Magazine.—"The lectures are of surpassing interest, and should be very widely read and appreciated."

Just Published.

THE EARLY HISTORY OF INDIA.

8vo. From 600 B.C. to the Muhammadan Con-
14s. net. quest. Including the Invasion of Alexander the Great. By V. A. SMITH. Second Edition, Revised and Enlarged. With Maps, Plans, and other Illustrations.

Athenaeum (First Edition).—"Mr. Vincent Smith may claim to have done a work which eminently needed doing. . . . It is to be hoped that authors of manuals of Indian history will take due note of this achievement, and revise their compilations accordingly."

A CALENDAR OF THE COURT MINUTES, &c., OF THE EAST INDIA COMPANY, 1635-1639.

8vo. By ETHEL BRUCE SAINSBURY. With
12s. 6d. net. an Introduction and Notes by WILLIAM FOSTER. (Published under the Patronage of His Majesty's Secretary of State for India in Council.)

Morning Post.—"Of considerable value to the student. . . . Miss Sainsbury has edited these ancient documents with consummate order and regularity, for the benefit of posterity."

STUDIES IN THE MEDICINE OF ANCIENT INDIA.

Demy 8vo. Part I. OSTEOLOGY, or THE BONES OF 10s. 6d. THE HUMAN BODY. By A. F. RUDOLF HOERNLE, C.I.E.

Athenaeum.—"Marks a new epoch in our knowledge of medicine. . . . Prof. Hoernle has executed his task with the utmost fidelity. He identifies the bones, makes important emendations, and gives commentaries in the original with a literary translation of each."

THE HISTORY OF THE STUDY OF MEDICINE IN THE BRITISH ISLES.

8vo. By N. MOORE. With eleven colotype
10s. 6d. net. plates. The FitzPatrick Lectures for 1905-6.

Scotsman.—"The book is learned in the extreme, and its information is based upon a wide and conscientious study of originals."

Prospectuses on Application.

LONDON:

HENRY FROWDE, Oxford University Press,
AMEN CORNER, E.C.

The Nation

VOL. II., No. 24.]

SATURDAY, MARCH 14, 1908.

[PRICE 6D.
Postage: U.K., ½d. Abroad, 1d.

CONTENTS.

PAGE	PAGE
THE DIARY OF THE WEEK ... 857	THE WORLD OF BOOKS ... 872
POLITICS AND AFFAIRS:—	Books to be Read ... 872
The Danger Point with Germany ... 860	LETTERS TO THE EDITOR:—
The Moderation of the Licensing Bill ... 861	The Urgency of Women's Enfranchisement. By Kate A. Hessel ... 873
The State and Unemployment ... 862	Compensation for the Publisher. By Lawrence L. Savill ... 873
The Limits of Anglo-American Arbitration ... 864	Weak Points in the Children's Bill. By W. A. Brend ... 873
LIFE AND LETTERS:—	Our "National" Games. By A Player ... 874
The Rich Man's Dilemma ... 865	The Kaiser's Letter. By Lesus ... 875
A Titan ... 866	The Rush for Small Holdings. By G. Montagu Harris ... 876
A City of the Soul ... 867	The Preservation of Mews. By John Fletcher Little ... 876
The Fear of Waste. By K. ... 868	REVIEWS:—
LETTERS FROM ABROAD:—	The Elizabethan Abroad ... 877
Another Combes Ministry? By R. E. D. ... 869	How Pleasant to Know Mr. Lear! By G. K. Chesterton ... 878
POETRY:—	A Paris of the Past ... 879
The Dream of Sully Prudhomme. By Herbert Trench ... 870	The Novel of the Week ... 879
THE DRAMA:—	Books in Brief ... 880
The Song of Songs. By H. W. N. 871	THE WEEK IN THE CITY ... 884

[The Editor will be pleased to consider manuscripts if accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes. He accepts no responsibility, however, for manuscripts submitted to him.]

Diary of the Week.

THE baselessness of the "Times'" description of the German Emperor's letter to Lord Tweedmouth has been exposed during the week. On Friday afternoon Mr. Asquith stated that it was purely private and personal, that it was "conceived in an entirely friendly spirit," that Lord Tweedmouth's reply was equally private and informal, and that neither letter was made known to the Cabinet, a statement in precise accord with the information given in last week's NATION. A similar communication was made semi-officially by the German Foreign Office, which denied that any attempt had been made to interfere with British naval policy. Lord Tweedmouth added in the House of Lords on Monday that he had shown the letter to Sir Edward Grey, who had agreed that its character was private. Lord Lansdowne did not ask for publication. He thought that private communications between Sovereigns and Ministers of foreign countries should be infrequent, and should not be allowed to affect the diplomatic situation. He blamed Lord Tweedmouth severely, but not too severely, for failure to maintain the privacy of the letter. Lord Tweedmouth had either betrayed his own secret, or had allowed it to be betrayed—had treated it as if it were a Private View of the Royal Academy.

* * *

THIS is an apt comparison, because the "Private View" is public to a mixed body of social celebrities, gossips, and journalists, and this is precisely the kind of publicity which the letter obtained. Its recipient omitted to explain how a communication which he withheld from the Cabinet came to be freely talked of in society and journalism, and was given out to a hostile Press in an inaccurate and most malicious form. It was, as we know, provoked by Lord Esher's suggestion that the German Emperor would be delighted to know of Sir John Fisher's retirement. "Why," we imagine, said the Kaiser in effect, "do you say such things of me, an Admiral of your Fleet, and proud to belong to it? And why do you point all your criticisms in ship-building at me, instead of at the United States, or other Powers, when my fleet is only a fifth as strong as yours, and I don't dream of disputing your supremacy at sea?" The Kaiser is said to have spoken chaffingly of Lord Esher's somewhat mysterious functions under the British Constitution. We should, indeed, welcome further light on the question of what those functions are.

* * *

LORD ROSEBERY spoke with power and freedom of the effect of such action. "Absolutely insane inferences" had been drawn from a mere bantering letter. It would not enter the head of anybody in Germany "outside a lunatic asylum" to try and influence British armaments. Our friendship with France should not make us hostile to Germany. We ought, on the contrary, to cultivate a policy of "amity all round," and avoid a "morbid suspicion" whose fruits were poisoning the Anglo-German situation, and might exasperate the whole German nation. The worst of the Tweedmouth incident is, we think, that it stops the kind of friendly approach which dissipates misunderstanding and leads up to a positive understanding or even agreement. On Tuesday the "Times" commented on these statements, without withdrawing a word of its article of Friday week, and on Wednesday Colonel Repington, its military correspondent and the author of the letter "Under which King?" in a communication showing singular ideas of taste, blamed Lord Tweedmouth for his "imprudence" in revealing the letter, and gave him an unsolicited testimonial as a strong upholder of our naval power. It would be more interesting to learn the circumstances under which this journalist came to know of the existence of the letter which he misrepresented.

* * *

THE British Note suggesting the appointment of a new Governor for Macedonia, and a series of administrative reforms, on the lines of Sir Edward Grey's speech, was communicated to the Powers on Tuesday. Austria is disposed to be hostile, but it is important to know that Bulgaria's opinion is strongly favourable. The Concert, or what is left of it, should be made aware of the fact that public opinion of all shades in this country is strongly favourable to Sir Edward Grey's proposals. On the railway question he is stated to have expressed a benevolent neutrality to all schemes, but to have made active British support contingent on the assent of the promoters to a definite programme of reforms. This, again, seems to us to be exactly the right policy, expressed in the right way.

* * *

THE Scottish landlords who are also peers have secured a second violent rejection of the principle of the Scottish Land Bill, chiefly on the ground that it damages their interests. The second reading was defeated by 153 votes to 35, the division taking place on a destructive amendment by the Duke of Montrose. The hostile peers ignored the constitutional ground, and merely alleged their own view of the needs of Scottish farmers. The Lord Chancellor declared this decision to be an usurpation of right, taken in face of the Ministerial promise to insert amendments, and that it challenged the Government of the country, the overwhelming majority of the Commons, and the still more overwhelming majority of the Scottish members, which alone furnished a key to the "sense of the country." Free contract, which was the basis of the demand of the peers, no more existed under the English Act which they praised than under the Scottish Bill which they condemned. The measure would "again and again" be brought before Parliament, a phrase which points to a third and swift passage through the Commons, and a third reference to the Lords, after which a forcing action, dispensing, if possible, with the further authority of the peers, will, we hope, be taken.

* * *

WE had quite forgotten the Liberal League. But it exists, and its ancient habit of much dining appears to be so inveterate that at the afternoon meeting addressed by Lord Rosebery on Thursday a speaker, in seconding an amendment, spoke to a toast. More serious was the attendance of a considerable body of Liberal members at a gathering held in honour of a statesman fresh from the destruction of a Ministerial Bill of first-rate importance. This seems to us an action of very dubious loyalty. Lord Rosebery's spirit was one of excessive melancholy, intermittently tempered by paradox. "I know no more undignified entity," said Disraeli, "than a peer in a panic." Lord Rosebery's fears are concentrated on Socialism, which he described comprehensively as a death-blow "to religion, to Empire, to liberty, and property." He sees its approaching triumph in the bye-elections of 1907, by which, we suppose, he means the return of Mr. Victor Grayson, hideously magnified, in Lord Rosebery's sensitive gaze, into a Terrorist Convention. He practically abandons Free Trade, yielding the entire Protectionist case that a tariff would yield an ample fund for social reform or for armaments. Three things, he thought, might drive us from Free Trade—the pressure of direct taxation (i.e., taxation on Lord Rosebery and the well-to-do), forcing the country on to "another source of supply" (i.e., the further taxation of the poor); the excessive cost of armaments; and the "formidable option between Socialism and Protection," in which case Lord Rosebery would plump for Protection. The rest of his speech was devoted to suggesting that the chief hope for England lay in the House of Lords. We did not perceive that any Liberal member present (there were 38) had any criticism to offer on these highly Liberal sentiments.

* * *

THE brewing trade has started a campaign of unmeasured resistance to the Licensing Bill. In Surrey they are threatening to withdraw all money from charities. Elsewhere it is proposed to boycott all tradesmen who support the Bill. Mr. Stanley Boulter, the chairman of the Brewery Debentures Association, has written an open letter to the Bishop of London, which he has published in the form of an advertisement in the "Times." Mr. Boulter, having received an invitation to attend a meeting to discuss the spiritual (not spirituous) needs of London, declined on the ground that his thoughts might wander from these subjects on to the Licensing Bill, and the attitude of the Bishops upon it. He concludes with a plain hint that the time will come when the Bishops will want friends, who will be alienated by their support of "this evasion of the eighth commandment." The Bishop replies rather weakly by saying that he can only support a twenty-one years' time-limit. A Surrey brewer has also written to the Primate "venturing to predict" a large falling-off in subscriptions to "religious charities" if the Bill becomes law.

THE Archbishop of Canterbury has written to Mr. McKenna a letter on the Education Bill, which, while rejecting its proposals, both for town and country schools, states that decision moderately, and seems to leave the door open to accommodation. The Primate has to admit the validity of contracting-out, for he has himself proposed it, but he concludes (without giving reasons) that it would only apply to a slender number of Voluntary schools, and even in their case might involve "lowered salaries and inferior equipment." In single-school areas, he admits an "advance on former schemes," but thinks the arrangement for denominational instruction inadequate, and suggests that the parents should have some further right of choice as to religious teaching. The Primate's language is vague and fluent, but he suggests as the religious basis of education "the building up of character in the faith and fear of God." He abstains from saying whether he thinks Cowper-Templeism (as defined in the London Syllabus) satisfies this condition. Yet it was drawn up by Anglican divines and founded on Anglican formulas.

* * *

DESPITE the extravagant Press rumours, the King of Spain's visit to Barcelona passed off without incident. Barcelona has a bad name. Since the first bomb explosion in 1892, the city has had more than fifty, two within the last few days, which were the occasion for the usual declaration of a state of siege. These facts, together with the fact that during the King's previous visit an attempt was made to assassinate Señor Maura, have supplied the Press with many reports of plots and demonstrations. There is much Socialism and some Anarchism in this, the Manchester of Spain, and the Spanish Government is always anxious to widen the rift between Republican Barcelona and the rest of Catalonia, which is just as strongly Separatist but Catholic and Carlist. During the last election the Carlists formed a bloc with a section of the Republicans which Señor Maura has been trying to split. He has won over some of the Carlists, and the visit of the King to Barcelona is intended to secure more legitimate support, more particularly for the Local Government Reform Bill which is now before Parliament.

* * *

THE long debates on the Navy Estimates resulted on Monday in a slightly new statement of policy by the Government. Mr. Balfour put to Mr. Asquith the highly practical conundrum whether in the latter part of 1911 Germany might not have thirteen "Dreadnoughts" and "Invincibles" to our twelve. Mr. Asquith replied that she might, if it were assumed that we did nothing beyond our fixed programme, that Germany carried out her paper ideas to the letter, and that she was able to build a "Dreadnought" in twenty months, which there is no probability of her doing. He added that, should such contingencies become probable, it would be the duty of the Government to see that German superiority did not become "an actual fact," a statement which the House naturally received with approval. But no Government and no man conducts affairs on a string of idle hypotheses. Mr. Asquith also said that for the purpose of maintaining our "unassailable supremacy" at sea the two-Power standard would be adhered to. Does this mean that we are to build against the United States, which is, on paper, the second naval Power, as Germany is probably the third?

* * *

M. CLEMENCEAU's Ministry is getting shaky. Its Moroccan policy has disturbed many of its supporters, and its programme of reforms has hardly come to anything yet. The discussion of the Income-tax Bill has only just commenced, and the Old Age Pensions Bill, passed by the Chamber more than a year ago, is still hung up in the Senate. It is no consolation that it has been very active in imprisoning anti-militarists, and preventing teachers and other civil servants forming trade unions, measures which have won the cordial approval of the Conservatives. Good Socialist-Radicals are looking out for a more satisfactory successor, and M. Combes is said to be their favourite. Matters have not got to this pass, but on Tuesday the Government received a serious snub when the House, by a large majority, voted, against its wishes, the reinstatement not only of M. Reinach, who was deprived of his commission for the defence of Dreyfus, but of the civil servants dismissed for trade union propaganda. M. Clemenceau has repeatedly said that he will resign as soon as he is dependent upon Conservative support. He may not have to wait long to carry out that pledge. Meanwhile, we are glad to have the news of M. Fallière's state visit to London, accompanied by the Minister of Foreign Affairs.

* * *

It looks very much as though China was making good its contentions with regard to the seizure of the Japanese steamer, the "Tatsu Maru," by a Chinese revenue cutter off Macao. There is no doubt that the "Tatsu Maru" was engaged in supplying the Chinese rebels with arms and ammunition, but the Japanese claimed that the cargo was regularly consigned to Macao, and that the ship was seized within Portuguese waters, and they demanded its release, an apology, and compensation. The Chinese reply that the ship was seized outside Portuguese waters, and that it had already discharged its cargo on the Chinese coast for the use of Chinese rebels. There are conflicting reports that China has apologised, but it was quite clear that Japan is dropping its blustering tone, and it will be a matter for congratulation if China successfully resists bullying in an affair where legal as well as moral right seems on its side.

* * *

THE quality of German Liberalism is being subjected to another test. Prince Bülow has introduced an Associations Bill, which on the whole is welcomed by the Liberals, because in some of the States the rights of political association and public meeting are either non-existent or very restricted, and have been pretty generally denied to women. The seventh clause, however, prescribes that all speeches must be in German. This is aimed against the Poles, but bears tyrannically on the Danes of Schleswig, and the French of Alsace-Lorraine. The Reichstag Committee has rejected the clause, but the Government insists that it must be restored in a satisfactory form, or the whole Bill will be withdrawn. The "Frankfurter Zeitung," and all Liberals worthy the name, are urging resistance; but the mass of German Liberals are social Jingoos. Herr von Sydow, the new Secretary to the Treasury, has announced that the increase of the wages of officials in both Prussia and the Empire, who are miserably paid, must be postponed, although the two Governments are pledged to it, until the problem of raising new revenues can be solved. The question of ways and means offers no difficulties when the expropriation of Polish citizens or the swelling of armaments is at issue.

* * *

THE Roman Inquisition has, as we anticipated, issued a fiercely worded condemnation of the Abbé Loisy's writings, pronouncing him to be a publicly excommunicated person, to be boycotted by all believers. Rome thus follows her familiar course, and drives away her ablest and most famous son, not, however, before Loisy's gifts of style, his unrivalled learning and power of critical analysis, have made him one of the greatest personal forces in the Christian world. Meanwhile, the extent and power of the Modernist movement are attested by the fact that inquisitions are being set up in all Catholic dioceses throughout the world for the impeachment of writers and preachers.

GENERAL D'AMADE, who no doubt sees himself on the point of supersession, greeted the despatch of the Commission of Inquiry with a renewal of casual slaughter. For the moment, however, the centre of gravity of the Moroccan problem is outside Morocco. The German Government has taken note, without approval or disapproval, of the despatch of French reinforcements, but has pointed out the great loss German economic interests are suffering from the French operations. According to the "Manchester Guardian" the arrangements for a public meeting in Manchester, and a joint deputation of London and Manchester merchants to the Foreign Secretary, to protest against French action in Morocco, have been suspended on the receipt of a hint from London that peace will be restored within a short time. It looks as though Sir Edward Grey had at length given the French Government some good advice. If that be not so, and M. Clemenceau has not decided to end the business, pressure is certain to be resumed by English commercial men, and Germany's patience is not unlimited; but the knot of the tangle may soon be cut in the French Chamber.

* * *

WE fear that the miners entombed in the depths of the Hamstead Colliery have perished, and that for them, at least, though not for the world, the brave Welsby died in vain. Such deeds lighten the darkness of life. Six of the missing men were found dead on Thursday. They were discovered lying by a door "in a peaceful attitude." On the door was written, "The Lord preserve us," and "For we are all trusting in Christ."

* * *

MR. BENJAMIN WAUGH, the founder of the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, died on Wednesday at the age of 69. Mr. Waugh created and sustained a great standing inquisition on the wrongs which British children suffer at the hands of their parents and guardians. He brought out the most horrible facts, existing on the widest scale, and proved them, by public prosecutions of the worst cases, over and over again. He was rarely found to have been unjust or inaccurate, though his material was often of the most sensational kind, and he was wise in making the main object of his society preventive rather than punitive. He was a man of extraordinary zeal and energy of mind, armed with a will which, as in the case of a greater man, fretted his "pygmy body" to decay. The Criminal Law Amendment Act, the Act for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, and the Children's Bill are three monuments of his life's work.

* * *

ON Thursday afternoon, the Spring Exhibition at the Whitechapel Art Gallery was declared open by Lady George Hamilton. Lord Courtney was present, and gave an address, in the course of which he made reference to the assiduity and enterprise shown by the Director and the Secretary of the Gallery in their organisation of its exhibitions. Certainly this last collection of pictures is one of the best of many good ones. The large upper gallery contains, its space considered, a fair representation of British art, as practised by present-day members and adherents of the Royal Academy, the Scottish Academy, the New English Art Club, and the International Society. The rooms on the ground floor are devoted to copies, by dead and living artists, of several famous "old masters," from home and abroad. It will be, we fancy, among these reproductions of the great Venetians and Florentines and Spanish that the average visitor will linger, for most of them are wonderfully well wrought, by copyists who have also been creators; the Velasquez, for instance, by the late John Philip and Mr. Sargent, the Titians by Alfred Stevens, and, particularly, Gainsborough's translation of Vandyke's "Lords John and Bernard Stuart," are things that one values hardly less for themselves than for the sake of their originals.

Politics and Affairs.

THE DANGER POINT WITH GERMANY.

THE best that can be said about the conduct of the "Times" in the matter of the Kaiser's letter is that no one can, by any stretch of language, say that public opinion in this country has been seriously misled by it. Even the journalism which we call "yellow" or "new" has been correctness itself. It was only the leading English journal which could on a Friday declare that the German Emperor had written an essentially non-private letter to the First Lord of the Admiralty with intent to interfere in our Estimates in a manner favourable to German interests, and incidentally to seduce him from his allegiance to his own Sovereign and country, and on the following Tuesday, having been told that the letter was absolutely private and quite harmless, and that it had nothing to do with our Naval Estimates, could recur to the subject without an apology for its own words and acts, and with many injurious suggestions concerning the man whom it had wronged. We do not do the "Times" the injustice of supposing that the gentleman who wrote the article of Friday week knew that he was stating what was false. He was clearly ignorant of the cause, the circumstances, the date, the character, and the wording of the document with which he dealt. But on Monday night the conductors of the "Times" must have been better informed, and we confess that we can only faintly imagine the condition of mind of journalists who, with knowledge of their error, can have acted as if their earlier statement was a communication of truth.

It is necessary to mark the consequences of this conduct. The public now knows vaguely, and from other sources than the "Times" newspaper, that the German Emperor wrote to Lord Tweedmouth in frank anger at Lord Esher's suggestion that he, an Admiral of the Fleet, proud of his honour, would gloat over the retirement of its chief administrator. But it can never know this for certain, and though the legend of an audacious and sinister act may die away to-day, it is maintained by its inventors, and may be revived to-morrow. We need not urge the wickedness of such conduct, but we may well ask even Conservatives to mark its extreme impolicy. In the days preceding the Boer War, the British case against the South African Republic was so presented by the "Times" and other newspapers as to convince the greater part of the civilised world that it contained barely a shred of right. The same course is being pursued against Germany, with the apparent belief that the English public can, in the end, be convinced that that country and its Sovereign are embarked on a course of policy aimed at the destruction of the British Empire. If this purpose is achieved, there will be war, a war engineered by a small body of men who, if their names were revealed, might stand before the world as of rather small account in public character and political judgment. But it will be war in which few outside these islands will think us in the right. A moral factor of this kind may be belittled when our antagonist is an unfriended and remote Republic. It is not to be despised in the case of a Power like Germany, where, as Lord Rosebery properly reminds us, a nation possessing many elements in common with our own democracy may be either won to friendship or aroused to bitter and determined hostility, and to the quest of allies who may not be found wanting. We hate even to discuss such a crime as a war with Germany. But action like that of the "Times" tends to bring it nearer, and to present our own policy and methods in a light most unfavourable to the character and wisdom of our nation. We have no doubt that for that reason it will impose some temporary restraint on the more astute practitioners of the cult of anti-Germanism. But it will not change their aims, or divert their missiles.

The behaviour of the "Times," however, is by no means the only point of danger in the Anglo-German situation. We may look to it to supply fresh fuel for the German Jingoism, new reasons for pressing on the enlarged shipbuilding programme, and to discourage the kind of friendly informal approach between the two Governments out of which a quiet understanding as to relative armaments might grow. But there are other and grave sources of trouble. We cannot view without concern the growing demoralisation in the naval service. When Admirals turn agitators, administrators become journalists, and the First Lord cannot keep his most intimate correspondence from the Opposition Press, there is something which requires a firm word, and possibly a marked intervention, from the heads of the Government. The author of the letter, "Under which King?" taunts Lord Tweedmouth with imprudence in revealing a letter which he did not disclose to the Cabinet. It is necessary to ask for what purpose it was revealed. Not, we quite believe, in malice by Lord Tweedmouth. But that malice was behind the half-disclosure to the "Times"—the malicious purpose of destroying or minimising all ameliorative elements in the Anglo-German situation—is clear. The German Emperor is not likely to write any more friendly letters to British statesmen, and our own King and Government will be equally cautious, and even timid. So a peace gate has been temporarily closed, while the war gate remains ajar. By whose hands? We should much like to know, but even this consideration is of much less consequence than the fixed idea which appears to govern a section of politicians in this country that the German naval programme of 1906, with its later revision, has a distinctly provocative aim as against our own fleet. This is not a point of antiquarian interest; it deeply involves the relationships between the two countries. It cannot be too often repeated that the now discredited German programme of 1900 was superseded by that of 1906, with its enormous leap from warships of 13,000 tons to vessels of 18,000 or even 20,000 tons, because, not content with the unparalleled superiority which our contemporary plans afforded us, we took our own much-vaunted stride into the "Dreadnought" class. That action woke up the entire shipbuilding world to a new conception of naval power, which Germany was neither the first nor the second Power to realise. The United States, which is conveniently ruled out of the two-Power standard, though on paper it commands the second naval force in the world, is a "Dreadnought" builder, so is France, so is Japan, so even is Russia. No more competent witness on this point can be cited than the famous constructor who writes to the "Spectator" under the signature, "Civis." At the beginning of 1905, says this eminent man, the British Navy "occupied a position of relative strength that had never been approached since ironclads were built." Then came the ship which was said to outclass and make obsolete all existing war-ships.

Unfortunately this boast, says "Civis," failed to recognise that if it were true, "a very heavy blow would be struck at our existing naval supremacy." A new race was entered on, based on the notion of the "scrapping" of existing navies in favour of a new untried type—a process in which we, having arrived at the top point of our own superiority, must naturally suffer most. The statesman responsible for this capital error was Mr. Balfour, and it argues no small assurance on his part that he should now come forward with a calculation of the relative strength of the British and German navies nearly four years hence, from which all British ships but "Dreadnoughts"—even those approaching within 1,400 tons of their displacement, and quite possibly excelling them in fighting power—were excluded. We are sorry that Mr. Asquith should be drawn, as he was drawn on Tuesday, into this vain argument. Mr. Balfour, choosing some month or months at the end of 1911, pretended that we should then have twelve "Dreadnoughts" and "Invincibles" against Germany's thirteen. Such an estimate is mere hypothetical scare-mongering. It is based on the fantastic notion that the whole of our existing fleet is to be ruled out, and that while we are to build no more "Dreadnoughts," Germany will build ships that do not exist at a rate at which she has never been able to build before. If we go on building at the rate of three "Dreadnoughts" a year, and Germany builds faster than she is building now, we shall have at the beginning of 1911 sixteen "Dreadnoughts" to her six, and at the beginning of 1912, nineteen to her ten, to say nothing of "Nelsons," "King Edwards," and other classes of still new and powerful battleships, all greatly superior to any vessel that Germany has afloat. To speak the language of panic in such conditions of existing power, and of productive capacity, is a gross assumption on the part of the statesman who is responsible even for the small contingent risks on which he dilates. The perils of the situation are not material: they are moral. They reside in the levity and falseness of a section of a Press which continually stokes up the feeling that finds its material expression in new armaments, and in the manner in which the Conservative Party, under Mr. Balfour's direction, is heading straight for war with Germany.

THE MODERATION OF THE LICENSING BILL.

We hope that the Government will clearly and firmly distinguish between reasonable criticism of the Licensing Bill and the campaign of furious unreason which the brewing interest has organised against it. If this great trade imagines that such proceedings as the boycotting of charities or of temperance tradesmen, and the unveiled threats to the Primate and the Bishop of London to withdraw both political and financial support from the Established Church, will have any other effect than to reveal the anti-social character of their enterprise, they are greatly mistaken. They should at least realise that the heads of the Anglican Church cannot in decency allow themselves to be "held up" by an industry which calls upon them to choose between their pockets and their consciences. Lord Rosebery some time ago described the brewing interest as "a political ring which threatened to throttle and strangle the Commonwealth itself." The Commonwealth, we hope, will not be "throttled" by the trade, but it will certainly take note of the admission of some of its representatives that its gifts to public objects—even its historic attachment to the National Church—are in the nature of a business investment. We do not believe that there is a civilised country in the world where an industry of the character of the brewing trade thinks itself strong enough to take up such a position. The American Oil Trust does it, but not the liquor interest. We are quite certain that no Government that respects itself can allow such proceedings and such language to divert it by one hair's breadth from its path.

Let us, however, turn to the Bill, and see what substance lies in the wild description of it as a measure of red ruin and wholesale confiscation. Let us note that, so far as the actual business of a brewer of beer or a distiller of spirits is concerned, it exercises no kind of interference. At the end of the fourteen years' time limit, it may be presumed that a fair number of Englishmen will be tolerably thirsty souls, and, retaining their appetite for the productions of Lord Burton and Lord Iveagh, will be able to gratify it, with or even without reason. It is possibly a dim suspicion of this fact which causes the professional critics of the Bill to vary a statement that the Bill will ruin their trade, with a regretful affirmation that it will do nothing to check intemperance. We, on the contrary, believe that the Bill will achieve the second end without accomplishing the first. But so far as interference with private property is concerned, it is necessary to point out that, so far as its chief provision is concerned, its action is of singularly limited scope. Under it the brewer retains his right of free sale, his plant, his houses, and their stock-in-trade. All that can directly happen to him will be that at the end of fourteen years the monopoly value of a licence, which has been created by the action of the State in protecting him from competition, may be sold by it at its proper market value, instead of being half given away to the selected class of which he is a member. If he had stuck to his proper business of selling beer and spirits, in place of speculating in public-houses, he would not even have been affected to this extent. But, as it stands, the time limit is merely a notice by the State that after a certain period it will feel itself free to collect its just dues. The precise method of conducting the liquor trade is in the main left open, until the nation can untie its hands for a well-considered measure of moral and social reform.

Thus far, therefore, the Bill is a simple scheme of public right, which stands on impregnable ground. But beyond that it is, in certain of its aspects, a plan of real amelioration, not only for the public but for the trade. Take, for example, the proposals for reducing the number of licences during the period of compensation. These were strangely misrepresented by Lord Burton in his speech of Saturday. It is clear that the Bill, so far from doing any injustice to the licence-holder, treats him more liberally than did Mr. Balfour's Act. In Mr. Justice Kennedy's interpretation of that measure the tied public-house was looked upon merely as an outlet for the trade of the brewer. Under this Bill it is regarded as a place where the licence-holder earns his living. In that character he will be entitled to compensation for loss of profits, and will certainly receive more than the beggarly ten or eleven per cent. of the compensation fund which is now his share. This sum, moreover, is not to be carved out of the total, as under the Act of 1904, but is an addition to it. The publican, in a word, is regarded as a trader, and not a mere item in the brewers' organisation.

But if Mr. Asquith's immediate scheme of reduction is advantageous to the publican, there is no reason to suppose that it will in the long run prove injurious to the trade itself. A reduction of drinking will, we believe, accrue from it, as the capital example of Liverpool, and also of Birmingham, shows. But this item of loss to the brewer should be more than balanced by the cutting down of administrative expenses. As things stand, the trade is done in far too many houses, which involve their owners in a continual financial drain. Lord Burton speaks with mingled pride and sorrow of the 167 fully licensed houses in Burton. What does Burton want with 167 licences? What does Ware want with one licence to about thirty adults? It is clear that the existence of twenty or thirty licensed houses in a small town is not only bad for public morals, but is an economically wasteful provision. Many of the processes of reduction—the amalgamation of business, the release of capital through the flow of the compensation fund, and the sale of premises—will add a new element of soundness to breweries as owners of tied houses. The reduction of licences itself is gradual, and its total number will not greatly exceed that which is proceeding under the Balfour Act. The loss of 2,500 licences a year is, indeed, a small number compared with the transfers which are continually going on under the tied-house system. As it is, the average stay of the licence holder in each public house is very short. Changes are continual, and the cost of them is serious. Under a steady system of reduction the better class of publican will, as now, quickly be absorbed in the reorganised and concentrated trade.

We may be asked what, if the Bill be a fair and reasonable one, is the reason for the animus of the trade against it? The cause is not far to seek. The measure has revealed in a flash the vice of the tied-house system and its reckless management by the trade. "The Licensing Bill," says the Financial Editor of the "Times," "whatever it may threaten, has not killed the brewery market. The market was dead before, and dead as the result of the speculation by brewers in tied houses which culminated ten years ago, and has been collapsing year by year ever since." The prices of brewery stock, says the same journalist, "solemnly quoted in the official list," were, to a great extent, "merely a row of polite fictions." What is the cause of the slump? The persistent treatment by the brewing interest of the licence as if it were a freehold, and the buying up of houses on that false basis. In this matter the brewers have acted against countless warnings, against repeated decisions in the Courts, against the advice of their own experts. Out of 360 breweries and distilleries, 345 have been registered since the Over Darwen case in 1882 made clear the historic right of the justices to refuse the renewal of a licence. The day after that case was decided, Mr. Nash, the legal adviser of the Victuallers' Association, wrote to the "Morning Advertiser" fully acknowledging the eventful character of that decision. "There cannot," he said, "be the smallest doubt that in the strict sense no such thing as a vested interests exists, and that, subject to appeal, the magistrates can refuse to renew the licence of the largest, most useful, and best-conducted hotel in England." Why, we ask, has not the trade acted on this warning? Why has it continued to finance its business as if the licence were a freehold, and why does it talk of the confiscation of an interest which its own agent declared years ago to be non-existent? Because it relied on its influence with the Tory Party to turn the annual licence into a kind of estate. It found a weak agent in Mr. Balfour, but even he has not been able to change the inveterate theory and practice of the English law. The State cannot confiscate its own property, still less does it commit an unjust act when it gives fair and long notice to resume its rights, and to consider how in future to dispense them. The trade may indeed cry ad misericordiam; it may ask—and in that case it will not ask in vain—for some regard to the business which has been built up on a reasonable expectation of a renewal of its licences. But there must be some limit to a State guarantee against private recklessness. We see that Lord Burton, in a letter to the "Daily News," while admitting that his company possesses a reserve fund equal to the amount at which its licence values stand, suggests that it is invested in mortgages on licensed property. Surely Lord Burton does not mean that he has invested his shareholders' money without seeing that there is a sufficient margin. If he has left no such margin, he and his co-directors have simply staked a sum designed to provide for one contingency on another contingency involving the same risk. Such a course would not be investment; it would be gambling. We hope that Lord Burton has been more businesslike, but in the broadest sense this is what the brewing trade have done. They have gambled with the law, with the public, and with their own property, and they are angry to-day because it looks as if they were going to lose.

THE STATE AND UNEMPLOYMENT.

THE obligation of the State to provide public work or public maintenance for unemployed workers, which is being discussed this (Friday) afternoon in the House of Commons, is no new or revolutionary principle. It has been embodied in the Poor Laws of this country for several centuries, and is an accepted policy of almost every civilised nation. Unfortunately the administration of our Poor Law during the last century has been expressly designed to render this public policy inoperative, by attaching such conditions of personal hardship and degradation as to debar most respectable working folk from accepting public aid, even in their direst distress. But public sentiment has been steadily advancing towards a demand for an honest and humane fulfilment of this public duty. The modern system of industry will not work without long periods of slack employment, and our industrial progress is achieved by means of rapid changes of technical methods, which often imply large and tolerably sudden displacements of labour. Even if workmen can make provision, as many of them do, against the minor leakages of employment, due to seasonable or other fairly calculable causes, their knowledge of markets and their narrow economic resources cannot enable them, either as individuals or by private co-operative effort, to grapple with the larger fluctuations of trade. That this necessary cost of modern industrial progress should fall with all its crushing weight of misery and degradation upon those working-class families who in ordinary times can just maintain a decent standard of life by regular and unremitting toil, is rightly recognised as an intolerable injustice and a grave impediment to social progress. It is impossible to deny the magnitude of the problem, or to contend that any sort of voluntary charitable effort is competent to deal with it. The workers, who represent the difference between the two per cent. of unemployed in 1899 and the more than eight per cent. in such a year as 1903 are ex hypothesi not unemployable, and to permit their labour-power to run to waste, and themselves and their families to sink in the scale of individual and moral efficiency, is a negation of national economy.

But it is needless to argue a social obligation which is in general terms admitted by all save a handful of belated individualists, and for the fulfilment of which the late Government made express legislative provision in their Unemployed Act. We may take it that there is a general agreement, among all who confront the issue without theoretic bias, that public local authorities should be empowered and required to find work, or else to furnish maintenance, for genuinely unemployed workers, under conditions which are not degrading and do not impede their return at the earliest opportunity to regular industrial employment. There is, indeed, a prior public obligation which is likely, we understand, to be enforced in the forthcoming Report of the Poor Law Commission, viz., that public authorities shall, by means of Labour Exchanges and like machinery, assist in draining unemployed areas, by enabling out-of-works to move easily to other places where their work is wanted. But serviceable as would be this method of improving the mobility of labour, it could not, of course, cope with any period of general or widespread trade depression, or even with much of the general unemployment of our great cities. Bearing in mind these facts, we cannot avoid the conclusion that it will be necessary for our Government so to develop the "sketch" legislation of the late Government as to furnish a really valid instrument for dealing with the emergency of unemployment in periods of bad trade. Mr. Burns and the Government can make a fair case for postponing immediate legislation, partly on the ground that it is desirable to await the Report of the Poor Law Commission, and to deal with this issue in its organic relation to other problems of industrial distress, partly because it is well to assimilate the results of the interesting and important experiments in afforestation, labour colonies, and other public works which are already in operation. But this postponement is not free from risks. It would be prudish to pretend that tactical considerations of policy can be ignored, in face of the strenuous assault upon our Free Trade policy, in which this problem of unemployment is now figuring as the chief weapon of attack. It would be suicidal for the Government to be compelled to go to the country during a period of trade depression without having made some serious attempt to formulate a remedial policy for unemployment.

Holding this view, we cannot help regretting that the measure introduced into Parliament by the Labour Party is damaged by so grave a vice of economic principle as to render its acceptance impossible by men who were not prepared for a reckless attempt to undermine our general system of industry in its foundations. For the provision of Mr. Wilson's Bill that public work should be furnished "upon conditions not lower than those that are standard to the work in the locality" is virtually an offer to furnish to all low-skilled and low-waged workers public employment which, by reason of its security, would be preferable to more hazardous employment under private employers. If our municipal unemployed authorities are required to find employment for all comers at the standard wage for unskilled town labour, the drift of rural labourers towards a guaranteed wage level at least 50 per cent. above the normal agricultural wage in most Southern counties, will be converted into a chronic rush, while inside the towns large numbers of general labourers, and the older and weaker competitors in most low-paid or less regular trades, will qualify for public work upon conditions which, nominally equal, will, in fact, for them, be superior to those current in the trade to which they belong. This demand, which stands in the fore-front of the Labour Bill, is not merely an item in the policy of the minimum standard securing for every worker a subsistence wage in public works, which, by the alternative it offers to workers, would compel outside employers to improve their wages and other conditions, so as to secure efficient employees. There is a good deal to be said in favour of this forcing-up system. But the present Bill would defeat this object, because, however much the outside standard wage were raised, the alternative public employment would keep pace with it, still offering a preferable employment to the less effective workers. In general terms, it may be said that any such proposal to establish unemployed public works upon the basis of conditions of employment current in any regular outside trades, belongs to the most illicit form of Socialism, which would seek to build up the new industrial order with the least efficient human material, in the worst organised industries, under the most difficult conditions.

Now it is essential to a sound unemployed policy that it shall be regarded as a species of social palliative for a specific industrial disease, not as a part of an organic attempt to reconstruct society. This requires that, while the conditions of public relief works must be such as shall not impair the economic efficiency of the worker and his family, they must not be such as to tempt him to remain in public employment a single day longer than the state of the outside labour market warrants. This being so, all ideas of using the unemployed to establish permanent works of public utility, which shall be remunerative according to ordinary commercial standards of utility, must be banished from our minds. Public local bodies may be encouraged to get such use out of the labour of unemployed men as they reasonably can, by planning and executing desirable work of repair or construction, at times when plenty of labour is available; they may even "make" work which, though fraught with some utility, would not have been undertaken in the ordinary course of municipal economy. In a similar spirit the considerable experiments in afforestation which our central government is financing in several quarters of England and Scotland may be legitimately enlarged; and other State works which lie outside the normal purview of private industry may be added.

In our judgment it will become necessary for the Government to develop a permanent machinery for dealing with the periodic unemployment of large numbers of genuine workers, as well as with the not less grave problem of the unemployable, and to furnish an adequate finance out of public funds for keeping intact the working efficiency and the homes of workers during temporary unemployment. But in the difficult task of fulfilling this obligation two essential conditions must be kept constantly in mind. First, the public in providing employment finds its chief gain, not in the utility of the product of unemployed labour, but in the protection of industrial weaklings against undeserved distress and injury. Secondly, this public provision must be ordered so as to assist, not to prevent, the return of unemployed workers to the common fields of industry.

If our industrial system requires a minimum reserve of unemployed during certain periods, the public must maintain this reserve. It must not enlarge it, or withhold it from ordinary channels of employment.

THE LIMITS OF ANGLO-AMERICAN ARBITRATION.

ANOTHER effort, the third of its kind, is now being made to conclude an Arbitration Treaty with the United States. We hope and believe that this time it will succeed. Some, at least, of the obstacles that wrecked the earlier treaties do not exist to-day. The Americans have largely outgrown their old and penetrating suspiciousness of British diplomacy. Anglophobia as a political force has undergone in the last decade a progressive decline. There are no issues of any serious moment still outstanding between the two Governments. Those that Mr. Bryce has just been endeavouring to settle in Ottawa are intricate, but not crucial, and the temper in which they are approached is on both sides that of sincerity and goodwill. Our people have long set upon Anglo-American friendship a value that can scarcely be exaggerated. They believe, and rightly believe, that the relations between the two countries are one of the determining factors not only in international politics, but in the progress of civilisation. In the United States, if the realisation of all that Anglo-American co-operation and brotherhood mean, or should mean, is less vivid and constant, there is, at all events, a general desire to preserve and extend the zone of international confidence. Both peoples believe in arbitration. Both recognise in it a principle whose tendency, in Kant's expressive formula, lies in the moral, rather than the pathological, direction. Both are conscious that their failure to embody that principle in a solemn compact is a reproach to the type of civilisation of which they claim to be the foremost representatives. The omens, therefore, are favourable. At the same time, the special circumstances of America are such as to restrict both the scope and the efficacy of any Arbitration Treaty. This is a condition which, after the failures of 1897 and of 1905, it would be foolish not to take into account. We do not believe that it is possible for Mr. Bryce and Mr. Root to succeed where Lord Pauncefote and Mr. Olney, and Sir Mortimer Durand and Mr. Hay failed. We do, however, believe that a limited success, and along more restricted lines, is both within their grasp, and is well worth striving for. The history of the previous efforts not only, in our judgment, confirms that view, but points with unmistakable precision to the conditions that will have to be observed if an Anglo-American Arbitration Treaty is ever to become a reality.

What was it that killed the Olney-Pauncefote Treaty, and that led the Senate, after emasculating it by amendments, to reject it altogether? There were, no doubt, many reasons. The Treaty was negotiated in the heat of reaction from the Venezuelan crisis of 1895, and the comprehensiveness of its provisions went, perhaps, too far ahead of American sentiment. Moreover, in 1897, Anglophobia was rampant throughout the United States; the Irish influence was adroitly used to foment suspicion and distrust; and the partisanship of the defeated Bryanites stopped at nothing to thwart and belabour the Administration. All these factors contributed to the final defeat, and even if they had been the only ones, their strength, under the conditions of the time, would probably have been enough to make defeat inevitable. But they were not the only ones, and the assumption that but for them the Treaty would have been ratified without amendment was clearly proved eight years later to be untenable. For in 1905, under wholly different circumstances, the American Senators repeated their action of 1897. They had before them a batch of seven Arbitration Treaties; they mutilated and devitalised them one after another, reducing them by identical amendments to an identical futility. It is most important to recognise that they could not have been moved thereto by the influences that were operative in 1897. In 1905 Anglophobia was not merely quiescent, but had been replaced by a real and healthy sense of friendliness towards both the British people and the British Government. Nor, in any case, could Anglophobia be a reason for emasculating Arbitration Treaties with Italy, France, Germany, and Austria-Hungary. Politics, again, in 1905, had little or no effect on the issue—both the vote and the debate disregarded the lines of party. Neither was there the objection to the scope of the Treaties that was urged against the Olney-Pauncefote agreement. All the treaties of 1905 were identical with one another, and conformed to the familiar Anglo-French model. That is, they were nearly as restricted as any Arbitration Treaty can be that is to retain a spark of reality. Yet all were so mutilated by amendments that President Roosevelt declined to proceed with them.

The truth is, we believe, that what drove the Senate to act as it did in 1897 and in 1905 was, beyond everything else, the primal instinct of self-preservation. The Constitution lodges in the Senate the right to a final voice in the conduct of foreign affairs; all treaties, to be effective, must be ratified by a two-thirds majority "of the Senators present." And that is a prerogative which the Senate betrays no intention of relinquishing. No legislative chamber in the world is so "touchy" as the American Senate, so sensitive to any invasion of its Constitutional rights, so tenacious of the privileges that either belong to it by law or that it is able to extort from weak-kneed Presidents. It is the last body on earth to surrender any of its authority, least of all on so vital a matter as the control of foreign relations. An Arbitration Treaty challenges that authority at its tenderest point. It cannot help doing so. The essence of all such treaties is that two Powers agree to refer to arbitration certain questions. Those questions may be few and insignificant. They may exclude all matters involving the "national honour" or "vital interests"; they may be so limited as to turn merely on points of law or the interpretation of existing treaties. But in the case of the American Senate these restrictions and exclusions make no difference. If a treaty provides for automatic arbitration on any questions, however unimportant in numbers or in quality, it must to that extent infringe upon Senatorial prerogatives. It practically takes away certain powers that the Constitution vests in the Senate, and transfers them to the President. It exalts the Executive at the expense of the Legislature. It allows the President to carry a negotiation with a foreign Government through practically all its stages without consulting the Senate. To ask the Senate to concur in a general Arbitration Treaty is, therefore, from its point of view, to ask it to commit political suicide. It is to ask it to abdicate in favour of its great rival, the President.

This is a demand to which we see no likelihood of the Senate yielding. Presidents Cleveland, McKinley, and Roosevelt have each and all failed to change its attitude. From the safe and legitimate shelter of the Constitution it has defied with equal success public opinion and three of the strongest Presidents in American history. It is scarcely, therefore, an exaggeration to say that a general, automatic, and effective Arbitration Treaty with the United States is a Constitutional impossibility. The utmost concession, in our judgment, that can be wrung from the Senate is an acceptance of arbitration as a principle, coupled with a provision that the principle shall only be invoked and applied, in any given case, with the concurrence of the two-thirds majority required by the Constitution. That is as far as the American Senators would go in 1897; it is as far as they went in 1905; it is as far, we fear, as they can ever be induced to go. The situation is regrettable, and, in a sense, disheartening, but it cannot be either altered or ignored. To recognise its limitations is not, of course, to advocate inaction; it is to mark out the sphere within which an advance is practicable, and it is to forestall the disappointment that has twice already awaited the policy of attempting too much.

Life and Letters.

THE RICH MAN'S DILEMMA.

LUXURY has been a famous subject for intellectual philanderers. Its meaning is ill-defined, and the notions and sentiments it arouses are mixed and flabby. Hence the humour of most modern experiments in "the simple life," in which well-to-do persons play at thrift with good taste, or amiably seek for some theoretically right limits of expenditure which they fail to find. There is not even any fixity in the articles that embody luxury. A motor-car is a typical modern luxury. But for a doctor it may well rank as a necessary. A fur coat is a luxury in London, a necessary in Moscow. A hand-made watch was a necessary a century ago; it has now become a luxury, like most products of the revived "arts and crafts." It is a commonplace that the luxuries of yesterday become the comforts, conveniences, or even the necessities of to-day. Yet nobody doubts that for a given person, at a given time, in given circumstances, certain things are luxuries. To whole classes the profuse expenditure of the class above them ranks as luxury, and the more candid souls amongst us may even specify the elements of luxury in their own consumption. So the word continues to be freely used, and to awaken feelings of reproach or of resentment. As a factor in the demoralisation of individual character it has always been denounced not only by private moralists, but by the Churches. But a curiously crude economics, which, lurking through the ages, and first fully formulated by Mandeville in his Fable of the Bees, found a public benefit in this private vice, long screened from the general mind the social waste which luxury involves. And though most people of ordinary education now understand that the luxurious expenditure of the rich is no longer necessary in order to "give employment" to the poor, few have carried their analysis of the matter far enough to furnish any counsel of relief to those whom we may call "the anxious rich."

For it cannot be questioned that among the well-to-do classes many are seriously concerned with this aspect of the distribution of wealth. They frankly recognise that a sharing, according to which, as a competent authority recently estimated, nearly one-half of our national income goes to one-eighth of the population, implies a colossal waste of wealth in the sense of wholesome human satisfaction. For luxury is twice cursed; it curses him that gives and him that takes. A double injury to life is wrought—the torpor of brain and heart and liver which repletion brings as the wages of excess, and the starvation of body and soul which comes to others from the want which luxury entails. A demand for commodities which forces multitudes of men and women to pour their productive energy into forms of wealth flowing away in waste, while their own lives go by empty of all wholesome joy, is a grave indictment of our social order.

Nor is this all. Not merely does the excess of some imply the want of others, but the bad qualities of this excess react with ruinous effect upon the "standards" of the poor. A great deal of the waste in the expenditure of the poor is directly and obviously attributable to imitation of their "betters." "The conduct of any upper class, whether the superiority is due to worth or wealth, carries with it some prestige in the eyes of all 'lower' classes; and its example tends so far to be imitated."

These plain truths are excellently set forth in a little volume* by Mr. E. J. Urwick, who opens up in a simple but effective manner the whole sociology of the theme, and states, though he fails to solve, the rich man's dilemma. The first horn of the dilemma is already made manifest. The rich man cannot spend his income upon commodities of any sort without injuring himself by excess, and society by a wasteful disposal of energy which might have gone in ministering to real human wants. What, then, shall he do with his income if he may not spend it? Saving seems the only logical alternative. But will he be conferring any social benefit if, instead of buying luxuries, he invests all his "surplus" income, i.e., if, while he reduces the general demand for commodities, he increases the machinery for making more commodities? Assume that the whole of the "luxurious" classes, suddenly conscience-stricken, took to the simple life, and devoted the huge sum, say some £300,000,000 per annum, at present spent in luxuries, to furnish increased or improved plant and raw materials to industry (for that is what "saving" means). It is quite clear that not merely would the luxury trades suffer, but the volume of employment both for capital and labour must be greatly reduced.

No one who has not fuddled his intelligence with the delusions of J. S. Mill's wage-fund fails to recognise these horns of the dilemma. Saving will no more wipe away the sin of luxury than spending. Indeed, it is alike more injurious and less reasonable for a man to set up more productive plant at the very time when, by his own action, he has made less plant wanted, than to go on spending upon the "champagne and velvet" which to economists of the last generation ranked as the typical luxuries. How, then, shall he exorcise himself? Mr. Urwick thinks he has found a way when he points out that "there exist many charities which are universally acknowledged to be beneficial and worthy of support," and urges as a last resort that he can "surrender" pieces of his income to the State or the municipality for public uses, leaving them free to devote his voluntary contribution to the public revenue to any purposes they choose.

Now to our mind this is "no way out." Both suggestions suffer from the taint of charity. If the rich man himself selects the public objects, not merely is there no presumption that he will choose wisely, there is some presumption that he will choose ill. For the arts of making money for oneself and of spending money for others are widely different, and in some degree, at any rate, antagonistic. There is reason to suppose that most rich men cannot know the best or even the good public uses of wealth. But still more fatal to Mr. Urwick's proposal is the injury which such private munificence can, and does, inflict upon the public character, by doing for the State or the municipality what the latter are capable of doing for themselves. This is no fanciful grievance. The present writer has stamped upon his memory the case of his native town, which in his childhood captured a rich and benevolent brewer for its member and its patron. From that time forth its citizens steadfastly refused to put their hands into the municipal purse for any town improvement, for parks, public library, baths, hospital. They went, cap in hand, to their generous benefactor and got what they wanted. Mr. Urwick knows well how degrading such charity is to an individual working man. It is equally degrading to a community. Nor can one evade the cost by supposing that rich men might leave the State or the town free to use the donations as seemed good to them. This is no real remedy, for such complete self-effacement of the donor is incompatible with the psychology of charity. As long as a rich man recognises he is dealing with his property he will hold it his right, and even his duty, to place restrictions on its use. Here and there some larger liberty of bequest is possible, but this will be the rule. In our view there are few more degrading spectacles, and none more perilous to the cause of disinterested popular culture, than that which our big English towns offer when they invite some local millionaire to build their library or to endow their college, things which they are competent to do for themselves if they have enough genuine interest in education to make the necessary efforts and sacrifices.

The resources of the public are not so feeble as Mr. Urwick seems to think. By an equitable system of taxation public bodies can take as their rightful income what he would have them receive as a dole. This will only be termed confiscation by those who fail to recognise how very inadequately the public shares at present in the wealth it helps to create. There is, in fact, no other solution of the problem of luxury than that which cuts into the roots of excessive incomes. For the real problem lies in the fact that the rich man is called upon to spend that which he has not really "earned," a contravention of a strictly natural law which regulates the relations between the power of production and the power of consumption. It may sound easier and more peaceful to suggest that the rich shall make a voluntary concession of their riches. But in reality it is only one more revival of the beautiful but ineffectual theory of economic chivalry which Carlyle and Ruskin preached. It is ineffectual because the conditions of the growth of luxury are such as naturally warp the characters alike of the luxurious class and of those who abstain because they must, so that the former cannot give and the latter cannot with self-respect receive the use of surplus wealth.

* "Luxury and Waste of Life." Dent.

A TITAN.

"UNSUBDUABLE granite," Carlyle called Luther, "piercing far and wide into the heavens: yet, in the clefts of it, fountains, green beautiful valleys with flowers!" His words, said Richter, "were half-battles." The enormous controversial volumes, full of the matter and temper of a dead scholastic theology, form, indeed, no pleasant reading. But in the table talk, and especially in the letters, the man stands to-day, as he once lived, "a great brother-man." A hundred years ago Coleridge declared, "I can scarcely conceive a more delightful volume than might be made from Luther's letters, if translated in the simple, idiomatic, hearty mother tongue of the original." No such volume exists to-day. But here in "The Letters of Martin Luther," selected and translated by Margaret Currie (Macmillan), is a "delightful volume" in idiomatic English. It reveals the very heart of one of the greatest of the children of mankind: impetuous, tender, compassionate, full of vigour and full of laughter: with beneath all surface scorn and playfulness, a profound seriousness of outlook and purpose: a man "open to the divine significance of life." It is the work of one set in the long and ardent tradition of the prophet: Augustine, Luther, Cromwell, Carlyle, and all similar souls are looking on an existence whose outward events are symbolic of the play of ultimate forces behind them, and life is always a desperate battle-ground between God and His enemies. Devils swarmed in those German twilights, hiding in the forests, riding overhead in the storm-wind, visibly gathering together in some great Conference or Diet where liberty is to be once again assailed. "From the castle," Luther writes to Melancthon, "so full of devils, but where nevertheless, Christ reigns in the midst of His enemies." Ten days before his death at Eisleben, "I think that hell and the whole world must at present be free from devils," he writes to his wife, "who perhaps because of me have all now gathered in Eisleben." Twenty-five years before, summoned to the pleading which shook Europe to its foundations and gave birth to a new world, he had told George Spalatin that he would come to Worms, "were there as many devils there as tiles on the house-tops." "Christ lives," he wrote, "and we shall enter Worms in defiance of the gates of hell and all the powers of the air." Yet this valorous and dauntless soul was familiar with doubts and agonies, and had known the temptations of fear. "Not that I have no fear of death," he once declared; although he hopes "that the Lord will deliver me from this fear also." Riding to the Diet at Augsburg, "Show yourself a man, and teach the young people what is right," he exhorts Philip Melancthon. "But I go hence to offer myself up for them and you, if God wills it." "I am like Jeremiah, the man of strife," he cries in one of his times of depression. "God has visited me with great bodily suffering," he writes from the Wartburg; "I have not slept all night and had no rest. Pray for me, as this evil will become unbearable if it goes on increasing." "I do not grudge Dr. Lupino a blessed exit out of this life," he mournfully affirms, "in which, would to God, we did not live." He finds it "very hard" to be of different opinion from all the Princes and Bishops: but "it is the only way," he adds tersely, "to avoid God's wrath and hell." Sometimes he is exultant at the fire which he is lighting, as it runs, like a spark through dry heather, over the great ways of Europe. "From this, most holy father," he writes to Leo X., "has such a fire been kindled that, to judge from the hue and cry, one would think that the whole world had been set ablaze." More frequently he is filled with awe at the great upheaval, and with foreboding as he looks towards its future. "You must help us," he implores Wenzel Link at Nurnberg, "for the times and God's cause demand this. I must admit that unheard of things are happening, but it is against our will." "You are right," he declares later to another, "in saying that the world is going to ruin." But he has hope, as so many similar spirits had hoped in similar hours of twilight and dim dawn, of a sudden end: the visible manifestation of the spiritual forces so long hidden, so long patient. "I hope the day of the coming of the great God is approaching," he cries, "for we hear only of fires, murders, and fury over all." In a kind of exultation he offers his body and soul for burning, if by such sacrifice may be consummated the completion of the divine purpose in the world. "Although the Pope should assassinate me," he proclaims to his father, "and cast me into hell, he cannot raise me up again, to slay me once more. For should he condemn me, and burn me, my heart and will shall stand out against his absolution. I hope the great day is approaching when the kingdom of wickedness will be cast down and destroyed. Would to God we were considered worthy to be burned by the Pope, that our blood might cry out for vengeance, and therefore hasten his end." Sometimes the vision is less tumultuous and the sky serene. Beyond and behind all, "God reigns" is the continued burden of his message. "He is our God." "Christ lives: and I can lose nothing." "Be of good cheer and fear no one," is his exhortation to the Christians in Wittenberg. "By God's grace I am as courageous as ever." "Christ will come from heaven," is his firm belief at the end, "and kindle a fire against Satan and his emissaries. Amen."

That is one side of the man revealed in these letters, the strong, unbreakable spirit standing up like a tall rock in the torrent and whirlwind, to whom all weaker souls turned for strength and stimulus and consolation. He is corresponding with the Pope somewhere far down South in an Italy which he had once visited, where he had once been scandalised; "like Egypt long ago," as he describes it, "enveloped in thick darkness, being entirely ignorant of Christ, and all that appertains to Him." He is setting the North in revolt against abuses, yet is anxious not to make the breach complete, not to rush to extravagant excesses. He will not war against non-essentials in ritual and doctrine, and if a Reformed Preacher will not preach without a cassock, "Let him have a cassock to preach in then," is his reply; "let him have three cassocks if he find benefit in them." He is corresponding with rulers and princes, the Emperor, Henry VIII. of England, the King of Denmark, all the great ones of the earth. Every day of the life of the man is making history: making history in fire which was soon to be turned into blood. Yet "for the honour of God's Word," he cries, "we would rather burn amid fiery coals than rot solitary and half-alive, if it were God's will." And for counterpart there is the other side of his life: with a vast tenderness and compassion, love for father and wife and little son; a naturalness, a playfulness, a delight in natural and playful and beautiful things which exhibit this giant of controversy with at bottom the heart of a child. While he is shaking the pillars of the world he is writing to his wife; how that the Council send him for every meal "about a hogshead of good Rhine wine"; how that "the devil has ruined all the beer in the land with pitch." Refusing the risk of the crossing of the Saale to Eisleben because of the ice and water-billows, because "it is better to evade the devil than afterwards to complain of him," and it is "needless to delight the Pope and his emissaries through our death," he announces that they have "no desire to drink the water," "for we regale ourselves with good Torgau beer and Rhine wine, and let the Saale rage at its will." He often praised God for all the beauty of the world: "My pen runs away with me," he declared, "when I extol God's works." He dates his letter from Altenstein, "In the region of the birds, who sing beautifully on the trees, praising God night and day with all their might." When all Catholic Europe is gnashing its teeth at this renegade monk, sold to Satan, excommunicate from the Christian companionship, he himself is engaged in sampling "the Chase," "to get a taste of the pleasures which fine gentlemen love so well." "We caught two hares and a few poor roes. Truly a worthy occupation for idle people! Amid the nets and the dogs I pondered over theological matters." "I had managed to save a poor hare, and had it under my coat, but the dogs discovered it, and bit its leg through the coat, and choked it, so that we found it dead." His friendships were those of lovers. "I would rather die," said Melancthon, "than separate from Luther." "Whatever my dwelling-place may be," he wrote to the Elector Frederick, "I shall never to all eternity forget your Grace's goodness to me." His letter to his little son Hans is one of the most familiar classical pieces of German prose. "I know a beautiful garden," he wrote, "where there are many children with golden robes. They pick up the rosy-cheeked apples, pears, plums, from under the trees, sing, jump, and rejoice all day long. They also have pretty ponies, with golden reins and silver saddles. I asked whose garden it was, and to whom the children belonged. The man said, 'These are the children who love to pray and learn their lessons.' I then said, 'Dear sir, I also have a son, Hanschen Luther. Might not he too come into the garden and eat the beautiful fruit, and ride upon these pretty ponies, and play with these children?' 'If he loves prayer and is good,' said the man, 'he can.'" After the death of his little Elizabeth: "My little daughter Elizabeth has been taken away from me," he wrote, "leaving me almost in womanly sorrow, so deeply am I grieved. I never dreamt that a father's heart could have been so soft towards his children."

It is a Titan: in its simplicity, its humanity, its high courage, its unwearying, unending labour. The body too hardly driven failed while the spirit still burnt fiery and unquenchable. "I have served the people freely," was his plea, "with what God has given me." In his last sermon at Eisleben he exhorted the people to cleave to the Lord and Master, who calls the weak and weary to Himself. "I could say much more," he concluded, "but am weak, so will leave it alone." "Let us say and sing," he ends this great correspondence in a letter to his wife on February 14th, 1546. "Let us say and sing, that we shall wait and see what God will do." Four days later he was dead: a power vanished from the world.

A CITY OF THE SOUL.

EXPECTATION is aroused even in its approach: for the travellers is forewarned that he is coming to one of the wonders of the world. It can be seen far off, over the brown hills of Languedoc, with the blue hills for background: high roofs and spires and parapets and pinnacles, all pointing upward. The sense of waiting, of strength altogether unsubdued, of the guardianship of a secret still unconquered, is the first impression of that distant vision of loveliness. Its strong walls and towers, encompassing a little hill above a quick river, take also in that first glance an impression of unsubstantial pageantry. It seems from the beginning a dream city, grey in a bluish-grey mist, set high on a hill above the quiet stream. A dream city it remains to the end.

The new town of Carcassonne is a pleasant French provincial city, woven of rectangular streets, lined with trees, and white, green-shuttered houses: full of the normal French things which are unchanged from the Pyrenees to the Rhine: the somewhat too ornate, dark, incense-scented churches, the cafés, with their little round, marble-topped tables, the soldiers and the prosperous, stout, middle-aged citizens, with their jolly children, which together leave a sense of human comfort with a menace of insecurity behind it. Two tree-lined roads lead down to the old and new bridges across the Aude. A turn of the corner, round an immense convent, which advertises the reception of foundling children without question or payment, suddenly reveals that strong Vision of a former time: the twelfth century bridge, the winding river, the masses of acacias and poplars: with, high above them all, the long line of walls and towers of a city defiant of time and change: Carcassonne, as it has stood, guarding the Southern gateway of France, since France first was.

It is the child's dream of a fighting fortress stamped upon the scale of real life in the enduring stone. All the boyish conceptions of the medieval world are there: the romance of the novelist and artist who attempted, in picture and description, to exhibit the inner heart and significance of that astonishing time as a tangible presence in the world. The cities of the Arthurian legend, the home of the dim medieval twilight, all the North of the Gothic tradition in the hazardous days, has been left here, stranded (as it were) far in the South, an alien intruder. Carcassonne is a piece of a world long dead and buried, standing for the wonder and the judgment of a world considering itself alive. Carcassonne is a piece of a world which can never die.

It was constructed as a fortress for purely practical purposes: with no conscious search for beauty or of aesthetic satisfactions in its making. So that with its triple tier of wall within wall, its high gates and entrances, with the long, guarded pathways up the hillside, its outworks and defences, its long line of guarding towers, its high central chateau, with the flag of France still flying there, and the French Army still in occupation, it stands still for defiance and for courage. Defiance and courage are the notes of its past history. It has never been taken except in a struggle more than usually fierce and desperate. In the great Crusade which converted Provence into a slaughter-house the Vicomte de Beziers flung himself into Carcassonne. Offered safe conduct with twelve others, "Not one of my men shall the legate have by my will," was the ringing reply, "for it is for my sake that they have put themselves in peril." After fourteen days' continuous fighting it was taken: no more fighting men were left in its defence: all who survived were burnt alive or put to the sword. It was August, 1209—just seven hundred years ago. Thirty-one years later the son of the murdered man attempted its recapture, but after twenty-four days' siege he retired. The Black Prince, ravaging Languedoc with fire and sword, thought it prudent to leave it alone. Its defenders from their high walls gazed out on the burning of the lower town, themselves inviolate. Inviolable the city remained, while the noise of that continuous fighting fell into quietness, and a new world of tranquillity and comfort replaced the old forgotten things. Inviolable it remains to-day while the grasses surge up against its lichen-covered walls, and little pear trees and flowering almonds peep over the boundaries of its silent, grass-grown streets, and the watchers from the summits of its high towers and battlements see nothing but the flush of the green corn in the sudden springtime, and the purple of the vine in the long, quiet, autumn days.

Every corner and twisting street of its tiny panorama is alive with the flame of romance, and full of the shadows of all the past. Here are the long narrow walls guarding the crooked way to the water tower by the river. Here is the sally port and the postern gate for messenger or sudden surprise. Here is the moat—now strewn with flowers—and the double drawbridge; the portcullis, narrow windows for the shooting of arrows, overhanging eaves with apertures for the descent of molten lead or Greek fire. You can traverse along a narrow stone way, still ringing to the feet, the high inner wall where once the sentry marched ceaselessly night and day: rising by winding stone staircases into the towers with their tiers of stone chambers: descending low into black caverns beneath them, from which have been rescued chains and trinkets and dead men's bones. In the heart of the huge fortress gates which guard the two entrances you may enter a labyrinth of vast vaulted Gothic chambers, with immense open fireplaces, still blackened by the flames that once burnt there continuously: where the light is so dim that your guide will illuminate the place with huge torches of twisted paper, giving a magical impression of leaping lights and shadows. And all the while as you tread that high historic pathway you are looking clean over the little old city which still remains untarnished: between wall and wall, tiny houses, tiny gardens, narrow, crooked streets, with scarcely a sign of life amongst a remote, dwindling people, who still cling to the old city because their fathers have dwelt there, from immemorial time.

The little cathedral in the midst, with its broken cloisters, now a grass-grown space around it, set like a jewel within those high-grown ramparts, abides for the testimony of the tenderness which accompanied all that strength. The nave, the work of the earliest age, is dark and sombre and a little brutal: huge squat pillars supporting a low roof, all set in grey. But the choir has flung into it all the aspiration of the child world of the thirteenth century: with thin stone supports soaring upwards, and great sheets of coloured glass of extraordinary richness and beauty, and carved on all the capitals the birds and animals of the Middle Age, with angels and demons, warriors, monks, nuns, fabulous beasts rumoured to exist beyond the boundaries of the habitable world: all looking down upon the sanctuary, giving glory to God.

The cold mountain wind blew fiercely over the walls of the city all the afternoon. We looked down from its high parapet over the grass-covered hillside, sloping down so gently to the poplar-lined stream: white and clear in its stony bed, winding away over the pleasant land until lost in a fold of the hills. Beyond in a kind of blue haze was the little town which still occupies itself with the events of the day: with churches and public buildings rising from the maze of its regular streets, and the good citizens, after the day's not too extravagant labour, turning their minds to pleasure and repose. The horizon vanished in a mist which just allowed the indication of coloured cloud and coloured mountain, blending all the earth and heaven. At evening the wind became quiet, and the sun set in a great flare of crimson and purple in the West. We wandered out into the winter vineyards, all brown and leafless, to watch the black towers of Carcassonne standing tall and defiant against that fierce flaming sky. Until, as the glow faded into darkness, the little lights of the little new city shone forth serene into a huge black night, and as we journeyed homeward, the great swinging lamp above the entrance to old Carcassonne alone lit up the solemn, invincible fortress, secret and silent as the grave.

The appeal is obvious enough: present fascination, past compelling history: the old world of fighting and passionate emotion standing here in the stones and dust which once were alive. Yet analyse how much you please, the secret of that particular calling remains, at the end, elusive. There is here something beyond the stored-up poetry of time and the shadowy presences of so many vanished generations: beyond also that poetry of present beauty in the high-pitched roofs and tall towers, set in a background of the encircling hills. "Il n'a jamais vu Carcassonne" has become a proverb in the South, where the people, if they cannot explain, can at least understand. "You have been to Carcassonne," writes an American poet, not insensible to this magic of enchantment:—

"Then for you the goal is won!
You have grasped the unattained,
What we long for, you have gained."

For in some mysterious fashion the city set upon its hill, with its fortress towers black against the evening sky, or silent and watchful under the moonlight, has come to stand for a goal of high human endeavour—Urbs Mystica, "the city of the soul."

THE FEAR OF WASTE.

THERE is a fear of waste that paralyses the best energies of the soul, the fear that goodness, and faith, and love, may be flung away in vain. It is, at root, a fear that there is no God whom we can love with heart and mind and strength, that the poor human responsibilities which, whether for the sake of love or duty, we try to discharge at such cost, may only encounter infinite irresponsibility and irresponsiveness. It tells us that, after all, there is no inevitable connection between seed-time and harvest, and that while grapes cannot grow on thorns, they may not grow on vines, or we and those for whom our vines were trained and tended may never gather them. All things in heaven and earth are at the mercy of an unknown quantity. Let this fear take deep root, and we have no heart either to serve or to give, unless some positive recompense be immediately forthcoming. And our attitude towards spiritual ends becomes that of the customer who, before he pays his money, wants to see his money's worth.

This is constantly being illustrated in our social relationships. Many people contend, if not openly, in their hearts, that certain other people are not worth helping; and the contention is often more than an excuse for sloth. It may be maintained by those who, at all events, show energy enough in helping themselves, or those whose welfare is closely connected with their own. They take it honestly for granted that they are worth helping. And yet the malady that afflicts them is essentially the same as that of the veriest outcast who declares himself past help. It is the malady of isolation, assailing both Pharisee and publican, the belief that isolation is possible, that there is neither continuity nor coherence in the universal consciousness.

Where it exists, it always creates a proletariat. Everyone has an alabaster box, which he or she is perfectly willing to break at the feet of saints or heroes, or of the exceptionally charming and loveable. Only, we cannot be expected to squander it upon a proletariat, whether moral, mental, spiritual, or merely economic. For we don't leave behind the submerged tenth when we leave behind the slums. In ordinary society, in the college, in the church, we find our oligarchy, or plutocracy, and likewise the submerged tenth—the people who are always wanted, and the people who are never wanted, the fascinating and the merely irritating, those whom we cannot face life without, and those with whom we should be very sorry to face it. There are people whom it is always inspiring, always delightful to meet, and people who seem to devitalise the very air we breathe, whose presence, not their absence, makes us conscious of all we miss, the leaden of mind and soul. It is easy to coin epithets about them—only one thing is easier, and that is to join their ranks.

Refuse to face the problem of the proletariat in one region, and it meets you in another. We confront it in our own way. We hoard our alabaster box, till the volatile, ethereal perfume is lost, or turned to bitterness, or we spend it on the few and guard it jealously from the many, not realising that with the effort to guard it, its rare quality is gone.

Christ's way was different. He broke the alabaster box for all, and the whole house was filled with the perfume. We may be waiting and looking for someone like Christ, someone for whom it is absolutely worth while to spend ourselves, when all the while He is saying, "I was thirsty, and ye gave Me no drink. . . sick, and in prison, and ye visited Me not."

Some of us would enter actual prisons, till the proceeding lost its novelty. There would be a dramatic element in that. But what about prisons of dullness, complacency, Philistinism, of small-mindedness and spite—whatever prison it is that we happen to despise most, whose gate it is hardest to unlock? What about the men and women who are starving of sheer selfishness—thirsting with the insatiable thirst of wounded vanity? How simple it would have been if Christ had only meant prisons with high stone walls, or hunger for wheaten bread! But ministry to those other souls hardly looks like ministry to Christ. It looks like pouring wine on the desert sand. Yet that is what He did, and what all His true followers do; they know that the desert sand is only the chalice of God.

But do not facts contradict that theory? Look at the lives laid gladly down for lives of half their value, the wealth of service lavished on the churlish and thankless and base! Is not God the infinite waster, who takes our best human treasure, and dissipates it idly?

Even if it were so, we might make Clifford's answer, "That is no reason for saying 'Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die.' Rather 'Let us take hands and help, for to-day we live and are together.'" In other words, if God is bankrupt, let us be solvent while we can—rich in the only wealth that matters, the serving and the loving. Let us do what we may to stand for the dream of God, remembering that if what is spent may be wasted, what is hoarded must be. And somehow, if we live on those lines, we shall cease to be haunted by the fear of the insolvency of God.

It is in reference to love that the problem confronts us most vividly. And our fear of loving is not only a doubt of the universe, it comes from a radical misconception of the nature of love. We are obsessed, as usual, by pounds and pence and shillings. And we think of love as something locked up in a cashbox whose key we keep, from which we can always take out the exact quantity that meets the claims of the occasion. Now love is not a chattel, but a function. It is not a lackey to whom we can give a month's notice, with whom we can dispense if he breaks too much china, but a supreme authority. It would be absurd to insist on this if we were not always forgetting it. Love is the breath of the soul; people go on loving as they go on breathing, whether their love happens to bring them immediate joy or pain. To say that we will only love when we are sure that we shall incur no disillusionment, no disappointment, is like saying that we will only breathe on the moors or by the seaside. Whereas, if we stop breathing in the squalid slum, or the malarial swamp, wherever we happen to be, we shall never reach the windy uplands to breathe there at all.

It may be said, of course, that lovelessness is a condition that we cannot evade, just as love is. It is not true. It would be true if love were a mere emotion, but it is more—it is action, will, purpose, the deliberate choice of the soul. It may come without ecstasy, it may be a conflict, not a festival; it is love all the same.

Perhaps we lay too little stress on this aspect of conflict. Love is a battle; and there is not an incident of material warfare that is not repeated in its experience—the drill, the facing death, the forced marches, the hunger and cold, the terror of smokeless, long-distance firing, that come to all soldiers on active service in the course of a long campaign—a perilous, hard campaign, in which it seems largely a matter of luck whether a man dies of enteric or wins the Victoria Cross. Yet there is no joy of warfare apart from these risks. Some people would join the army if they were guaranteed against being wounded or killed, or put on half rations, or no rations at all, if the one thing that they were sure of was a comfortable pension. And some of us, if we had similar security, would at least act as if we did love others better than ourselves.

But that is the glory of the conflict; with no guarantee against loss, to bear the wounds, the hunger and thirst, that are no whit less real because they are not physical, for some end that we love better than we love our own souls. It is to risk all of the soul that can be risked, its mental and emotional, its very spiritual interests, if that were possible, as readily as men risk their bodies for their country, day by day. It is to forget the longing for a personal reward, that, in the intervals of fighting, haunts even faithful soldiers, in the joy of the conflict itself—for it is always joy to battle for what we love, although no soul learns this, till it casts off the fear of its own death. And, till that is done, it cannot really live.

K.

Letters from Abroad.

ANOTHER COMBES MINISTRY?

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Are we within measurable distance of a change of Ministry? The general impression in "political circles" seems to be that we are, although recent votes in Parliament would suggest that the Clemenceau Cabinet is in an almost impregnable position. The overwhelming majority which the Government obtained on M. Jaurès' interpellation in regard to Morocco might well satisfy any Prime Minister; but old parliamentary hands say that it proves nothing. It is true that the speedy fall of the Clemenceau Cabinet has been prophesied ever since it was formed, and it has nevertheless lasted for nearly two years. But its strength has hitherto lain largely in the fact that no other combination seemed available. Just before the summer vacation last year, M. Millerand made a bold bid for power, and it was understood that he had a Cabinet ready-made. But neither M. Millerand nor his prospective colleagues inspired sufficient confidence to make the Chamber upset the present Ministry in their favour.

The situation has now changed. For some time past shrewd observers have remarked a steady revival of the influence of M. Combes. That revival has lately manifested itself, first by the union of the two most advanced groups of the Senate under M. Combes' presidency, and secondly, by the election of M. Combes as chairman of the commission appointed to enquire into the liquidation of the property of suppressed religious congregations. The appointment of that commission was, indeed, mainly due to M. Combes' initiative and was in some measure an act of self-justification. For, although M. Combes was responsible for the application of the Associations Law of 1901 to the religious congregations, he is not responsible for the method in which the liquidations have been conducted.

Among other symptoms no less significant of the present political orientation must be counted the speech of M. Jaurès last week in the debate on the Income Tax Bill. That speech was a plain indication that the Unified Socialists are prepared to assist in reconstituting the old Bloc—on certain conditions. A speech delivered by M. Jaurès at a public meeting the next evening made it plain that one of those conditions is a change of Government. For M. Jaurès denounced the Clemenceau Cabinet in terms as unequivocal as those in which he had held out the olive-branch to the Socialist-Radicals on the previous evening. Other symptoms there are, more or less on the surface, such as the new policy of the "Rappel," which has become a definitely "Combiste" organ, and various movements in the political world less obvious to the public. Perhaps the most significant symptom of all is the panic of the "Temps." It is quite evident that the "Temps" regards the position of the present Government as anything but secure, and considers that the change is likely to be, from its point of view, for the worse.

It is difficult to define precisely the causes of the dissatisfaction with the Clemenceau Cabinet, which undoubtedly exists in the ranks of the majority. The cause is partly personal. M. Clemenceau is a man of brilliant gifts, but the gift of making himself popular is not one of them. He cannot resist the temptation to indulge his power of fierce, biting sarcasm, at the expense of his own supporters. He treats the Chamber rather as if he were a schoolmaster dealing with a class of naughty boys. In a word, he is très autoritaire; and, although on several notable occasions he has mastered the Chamber when the Government seemed to be in imminent danger, his manner of doing it has left keen resentment behind it. There are other more general causes. The forcible repression of the disturbances in the Midi, and, above all, the numerous prosecutions of anti-militarists for spoken or published expressions of opinion, have not been to the taste of the country. It is true that, in the case of the Midi, it was difficult for the Government to act otherwise than it did. No Government can allow a state of anarchy and open revolt to rage unchecked. But public opinion blames a Government for having allowed things to go so far as to make sanguinary repression necessary. I do not think that in this case the reproach is just. The Government tried conciliatory measures until the agitation became positively dangerous, and it was surely right in so doing.

The repeated prosecutions of members of the Confédération Générale du Travail and other persons accused of anti-militarist propaganda are much less defensible, and the acquittals which have resulted in most of these cases are representative of public opinion in the matter. Had the prosecutions been confined to that small section of anti-militarists who attack not merely the army, but the idea of La Patrie, the Government would have had more support in its action. That at least is the conclusion that might be drawn from the fact that two juries have been found to convict M. Hervé and two of his colleagues on the "Guerre Sociale." But many even of those who dissent most thoroughly from M. Hervé's anti-patriotism feel uneasy at political prosecutions of any kind, and doubt whether their chief effect is not to create sympathy with a propaganda which has taken very little hold on the French people. Why, it is not unnaturally asked, should M. Hervé be expelled from the Bar and imprisoned, while Royalists and Bonapartists are left alone? The clerical Press every day publishes articles which, if the law were rigorously enforced, would expose their writers to a prosecution for sedition. Nobody wishes to see such prosecutions instituted, but there are a great many people who think that the same toleration should be extended to the extreme Left as to the extreme Right and that the utmost possible freedom of opinion is appropriate to a Republic.

The Government has also been compromised by the support which it has received from that section of Conservative Republicans represented by the "Temps." This, again, is rather its misfortune than its fault, for it can hardly be said that M. Clemenceau has bid for the support of the Centre. The support of the "Temps" has been far from whole-hearted; it has opposed the income-tax, old age pensions, and the rest of the social programme of the Government as vehemently as it always opposes social reform. It is rather as the lesser of two evils that the Government has found some favour in its eyes, for the "Temps" recognises that the probable alternative to M. Clemenceau is a Combes Ministry, supported by a majority including the Unified Socialists. The policy of the "Temps" is a union of all Republicans against the Right on the one hand and the Socialists on the other. It is a hopelessly impracticable policy, for the mere fact of agreement as to the form of government is not a sufficient raison d'être for a political party. The natural line of cleavage in French politics is already, and will be still more in the future, the social question; on that question Republicans are fundamentally divided. A party including on the one hand advanced Socialist-Radicals, and on the other such politicians as M. Ribot and M. Méline, or even M. Doumer and M. de Lanessan, would indeed be an "organised hypocrisy."

There is also, of course, the Morocco affair. In that case the present Government is suffering for the mistakes of its predecessors. The position of France in Morocco is undoubtedly equivocal; she is expending men and money without the prospect of any tangible advantage. But her position has been made for her by the Act of Algeciras, for which the Clemenceau Cabinet is not responsible. It is easy to criticise the policy of the Government in regard to Morocco, but the weakness of the critics lies in the fact that they have no alternative. Even M. Jaurès does not propose that France should withdraw from Morocco altogether, and, unless she withdraws or embarks on a policy of conquest in defiance of the Act of Algeciras, there is nothing to be done but what the Government is doing. The opinion is steadily growing that the only way out of the impasse is to demand another conference of the Powers.

On what particular issue the present Government will fall, if it does fall, it is difficult to say. But should there be a change, everything points to a second Combes Ministry. M. Combes would not, it is true, be able to count on quite the same majority as M. Clemenceau. He would almost certainly have to do without the support of the anti-Socialist Radicals, such as M. Doumer and M. de Lanessan, who were the enemies of his first Administration, and who advocate a rapprochement with the Centre. But he would have, on the other hand, what M. Clemenceau has not—the general support of the Socialists. A Combes Ministry would therefore mean a further advance towards the Left, and such an advance would probably be to the taste of the country. The demand for social reform is growing in force and intensity. Nothing is more significant than the unwillingness of the Moderates, and even of the Right, to vote against the income-tax. We have been told by the "Temps," the "Journal des Débats" and the rest of the Conservative Press, that the vast majority of the nation is opposed to the income-tax; but the same papers accuse the Deputies of electoral surenchères because they do not oppose the measure. The two statements are mutually destructive.

M. Combes is no longer young, but he is younger than Gladstone was in 1886 and quite as vigorous. No French politician has been more maligned than he has, and none has deserved it less. Whatever may be thought about M. Combes' opinions, he is a man of uncompromising honesty and is singularly free from vulgar ambition. Honesty in politics, after all, counts for something, and it largely accounts for M. Combes' popularity. For he is extremely popular; indeed, he resembles Gladstone in inspiring strong attachment on the one hand and bitter opposition, amounting to positive hatred, on the other. He shares, too, with Gladstone that sure sign of popular favour—a nickname. Is he not, both for his friends and his enemies, "le petit père"? He is not an orator, but he makes an impressive statement. He is a typical French Radical, and his hawk-like face, and simple, logical mind and strong will express together the characteristic fruit of the statesmanship of the Revolution and of the modern movement in French Republican politics.

R. E. D.

Paris, March 4th, 1908.

Poetry.

THE DREAM OF SULLY PRUDHOMME.

"MAKE your own bread!" in mine ear the Labourer hissed,
"Longer I'll feed you not; scratch earth and sow!"

And the Weaver cried: "Make coats yourself!" and lo,
The Mason: "Take this trowel in your fist!"

Wholly abandoned by my Race to wrath
Of their anathema implacable

When I asked pity from the heavens, none fell,
But sudden lions stood in every path.

Dawn broke upon mine eyes with doubtful pang . . .
Hark, the bold Masons on their ladders sang!

The trades went humming by, the sheaves were twined!
And I knew my own good luck; and thank the Fates
No man can boast he does without his mates,
Nay, since that hour I have loved humankind.

HERBERT TRENCH.

The Drama.

THE SONG OF SONGS.

PAINFUL and unsatisfying as allegory nearly always is, we owe to a forced use of it at least one delightful possession. If the Jews had not elaborated a painful and unsatisfying allegory out of the "Song of Solomon," it is almost certain that this charming collection of love-songs would have been lost long ago in common oblivion, and the unlearned mind of Europe could never have known the touch of Oriental beauty. We may wonder at the peculiar genius of Jewish scribes who discovered their nation's spiritual history deeply hidden in the longing and rapture of lovers. Our wonder is increased when we are told that, even after it had been received into the Hebrew Canon of sacred books, the Song remained a storehouse from which the singers in taverns or the open air could always draw a stock of love-poems such as Eastern listeners delight in. Yet it was this uncritical patriotism, this spiritual exaggeration, that saved us the poems, even in the strangely entangled form to which singers and scribes had reduced them.

When once the allegory had been suggested, it was easy enough for Christian Fathers, in taking over the main part of the Jewish Canon, to discover in the Song a similar meaning adapted to the new dispensation. All the easier, one may think, because St. Paul had already applied to the primitive and hopeful Church the similitude of a bride. We should, indeed, suppose it likely that the interpretation adopted in our Authorised Version was first suggested by St. Paul's emblem, even down to the daring explanation of the passage, "We have a little sister," as a reference to the Calling of the Gentiles. But without discussing points of Biblical exegesis, we must again express our gratitude to the use of allegory for having preserved to us what Renan strangely called the only piece of Hebrew literature that has charm. Otherwise the Rose of Sharon would have remained dried and pressed among the botanical specimens of a few dusty scholars, and the lovers' language of half Europe would have been the poorer. Nor need we be surprised at this allegorical interpretation when we remember the ingenuity still practised by commentators upon the "Vita Nuova," one of the few other great love-poems of the world.

"I sleep, but my heart waketh"; "I was asleep, but my heart waked"—in an instant every lover knows that it was a lover who wrote the words. There lies in them the essential quality of love. They are the assurance that love's inmost nature has not changed through all the generations that have handed life down to ourselves.

"Who is she that looketh forth as the morning, fair as the moon, clear as the sun, terrible as an army with banners?"

It is the thought and language of all lovers that the sun and moon gaze upon as they pass from east to west. It is the language of lovers, just like his who spoke of the sudden miracle of a little smile, or his to whom a summer's day was not a good enough comparison, or his who was at the gate "till a silence fell with the waking bird, and a hush with the setting moon." All the crowding imagery of the Song—the dove's eyes, the lily among thorns, the apple among trees, the myrrh and frankincense, the thread of scarlet, the cluster of grapes, the two fawns feeding among lilies, the garden enclosed, the spring shut up, the fountain sealed—all these images are but the natural speech of mankind when influenced by what the philosophers analyse as "an illusion of the senses called love," or as "physiological affectability," or again as "association with a person of opposite sex and suitably reciprocal polarity."

In graver and more reasonable moments, when he is not so bewilderingly drunk with the presence of love, the Singer can still assert, as though he were stating an economic law, that "if a man would give all the substance of his house for love, he would utterly be condemned." It is one of those statements that irritate

Puritan economists, naturally disgusted at continually hearing that "Love is enough," when they know very well that it is sadly insufficient without a comfortable competency. But then lovers' economics are not founded on Fabian postulates. It needs some touch of youth or passion, or both, to understand them, and to lovers even the wildest assertions of the Singer will never appear either strange or disgusting.

"For love is strong as death, jealousy is cruel as the grave, the flashes thereof are flashes of fire, a very flame of the Lord. Many waters cannot quench love, neither can the floods drown it." There is the root of the love tragedies of the world, from the time of David, from the time of Phaedra, onward. And it is from this phrase that Mr. Nugent Monck has deduced the tragic ending to the dramatised version of the Song, performed by the English Drama Society last Sunday night. Many arrangements of the Song are possible. One may either regard it as a series of love-lyrics, composed largely under Persian influence and strung together almost at random. Or, if we take the present order of verses as original and necessary, we may interpret it as a dramatic lyric representing the passion between a king and a peasant girl, partly consisting of reminiscences of the happy days when he came to her under the disguise of a shepherd lover. Or, again, we may regard it, as we believe most commentators now do, as a dramatic contest in lyrics between a king and a shepherd for the love of a peasant girl whose heart has already been given to the shepherd. This is the explanation followed by the English Drama Society, except that, on the strength of the passage quoted, they have introduced a tragic note and a tragic conclusion, we believe for the first time. In their version the setting of the seal upon the heart and upon the arm is interpreted as the burning of a brand of slavery. An abhorrent negro is introduced to perform the deed, and the Shulamite peasant girl is left writhing on the ground, moaning in vain for the shepherd lover, whose voice is heard calling to her outside the walls.

It is a bold attempt. The Revised Version is taken line by line and almost word for word, is partitioned among various characters, and converted into a tragic drama of love and twofold jealousy. Much of the dialogue is inevitably forced to fit the scheme. In the original, for instance, there is not a hint of the "third maiden," who is here pictured as the jealous instrument of the Shulamite's destruction; and as for the "little sister," she gives Mr. Nugent Monck even more trouble than she gave the Early Fathers. We should strongly advise the Society also to keep the line, "I was asleep, but my heart waked," for the beginning of the next scene—"It is the voice of my beloved that knocked," and the rest of that beautiful passage, to which it obviously belongs. They would thus conclude the first scene with the words of the bride, "Drink, yea, drink abundantly, O beloved," uttered from the lattice to the shepherd below, or as she passes through the door to find him. And that arrangement is more dramatic and makes the rest of the tragedy more possible, if we must have tragedy at all in a poem so gracefully tender.

But the thing was worth doing, if only to recall the beauty of the words, new to many of the audience, if one might judge from the frequent inquiries as to what the play was all about. This was the more remarkable because the spectators as a whole, having evaded the Censor, wore the air of children who had escaped from a Sunday school with a tremulous expectation of wickedness. If such was their expectation, the Song of Songs must have disappointed them very much, and perhaps that was why they displayed far more enthusiasm for Mr. Nugent Monck's trifle called "The Votaries" than for Solomon's work. For "The Votaries" took us back to Pierrot and Pierrette, to a sticky clay statue that moved and talked, and the other charms of "The Yellow Book" when, twelve years ago, it was tottering with the senile depravity of wearied youth. By the way, the acting of the sticky statue was an admirable piece of realisation in the change from flesh to stone.

H. W. N.

The World of Books.

THURSDAY NIGHT.

THE next volume in Messrs. Constable's "Types of English Literature" Series is to be a work on "Tragedy," by Professor Ashley H. Thorndyke, of Columbia University. The book begins by a preliminary discussion of definitions, after which the author describes the way in which classical and mediæval drama gave place to the specifically English type of tragedy which came into existence during the reign of Elizabeth. This is followed by a history of the development of the type through the Restoration, the eighteenth century, and the Romantic movement, down to the acting of Browning by Macready. The account of the fortunes of tragedy during the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries should prove valuable, since for this period we are chiefly dependent on the annals of the stage and the biographies of actors.

* * *

READERS of THE NATION will be glad to hear that Mr. H. W. Nevins is at work on a book which will give an account of his impressions and experiences during a recent visit to India. The title will be "India in Unrest," and such questions as the causes of Hindoo disaffection, the problems of education and government, and the attitude of Anglo-Indians towards native institutions and society will be dealt with. Mr. Nevins's rare and brilliant gifts of style and expression are, we think, seen to best advantage in "Between the Acts"—a volume of delightful essays and sketches. His advocacy of subject races was shown in his book on Portuguese West Africa, as well as in the articles which he contributed recently to our own columns.

* * *

IN a couple of weeks Mr. John Murray will issue a reprint of the quaint "Memoir of Lettice, Lady Falkland," which was written by her chaplain, Dr. John Duncon, in 1647. The book gives some glimpses of the brilliant group which Lord Falkland gathered round him at Great Tew, but its main value lies in the light it throws upon the High Anglicanism of the seventeenth century. Duncon was greatly influenced by Nicholas Ferrar and the Little Gidding community, and he was also on intimate terms with George Herbert and Land. The "Memoir" contains extracts from a devotional work in the style of St. Francis de Sales, which Duncon wrote for Lady Falkland's use. Duncon's style has a certain charm and individuality. Many of his phrases are like Walton at his best, though he lacks the latter's direct simplicity and much of his book is spoilt by a love for overstrained metaphors—the besetting vice of the early Caroline prose writers. Miss M. F. Howard contributes a critical and biographical introduction to the volume.

* * *

A BOOK by Mr. Winston Churchill on his recent journey in Africa will be published during the autumn by Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton.

* * *

MR. FISHER UNWIN has in the press a new volume of essays, "Gospels of Anarchy, and Other Contemporary Problems," by Vernon Lee. The book takes its title from the opening essay, in which the modern individualistic tendency is discussed. Vernon Lee is of opinion that if any good is to come out of contemporary anarchic theories of the ego, it will be by an increase rather than a diminution of the healthy Puritan element. "It is, after all, the Puritans in temper who have done all successful rebellion against items of Puritan codes; whereas the egoist of the modern type is, nine times out of ten, the sort of person who tolerates evil for want of the self-discipline and consistency necessary to stop it." Other subjects dealt with are Emerson—whom Vernon Lee acknowledges as an exceptional influence in maturing her own thought—Tolstoy, Nietzsche, Ruskin, Professor James and the "Will to Believe," Rosny and the French analytical novel, and what Vernon Lee calls "the economic parasitism of women." The book ends with a discussion of Mr. H. G. Wells and modern Utopias.

* * *

ON March 20th, the first issue of a new penny weekly, called "The Mint," will be published. Its aim will be to deal in popular form with the main political, literary, and artistic events of each week. A unique feature will be a threefold review of politics in parallel columns, giving the Liberal, Conservative, and Socialist points of view. These articles are to be the work of three members of Parliament—Messrs. Chiozza Money, F. E. Smith, and Victor Grayson.

* * *

THE April issue of the "Chronicle" of the London Missionary Society will contain a number of unpublished letters written by Robert Louis Stevenson to the Rev. W. E. Clarke, who contributes his personal recollections of the writer. Mr. Clarke was a missionary at Samoa during Stevenson's residence on the island, and a friendship sprang up between the two men which lasted from the day of Stevenson's arrival on "a cloudless, tropical morning" until the day of his death. The article gives some amusing illustrations of Stevenson's inveterate Bohemianism, and of his efforts to eradicate this feature from his character in order to be a good example to the natives. In Mr. Sydney Colvin's edition of Stevenson's letters, Mr. Clarke, who was with Stevenson when he died, and afterwards conducted the funeral service, is mentioned as "an old and valued friend." His reminiscences are of great interest and have not been published before.

* * *

MR. G. W. E. RUSSELL has been entrusted with the task of editing the late Sir Wilfrid Lawson's "Reminiscences," and of preparing the memoir which will complete the biography. He would be most grateful for the loan of letters or papers, especially any that bear on Sir Wilfrid's early life. Any documents addressed to him, care of Messrs. Smith, Elder & Co., 15, Waterloo Place, S.W. (who will publish the book), will be carefully safeguarded and returned as soon as possible.

* * *

THREE of the vacant places in the French Academy were filled on Thursday week by the elections of MM. Francis Charmes, Jean Richepin, and Henri Poincaré. M. Charmes is a journalist and politician, who first came before the public about twenty-three years ago by a series of brilliant articles contributed to the "Journal des Débats," in which he warmly defended the policy of Thiers, which was vehemently opposed at the time. He still writes for the "Débats," and, since Brunetière's death, he contributes a fortnightly article on politics to the "Revue des Deux Mondes." M. Poincaré was elected in accordance with the tradition which reserves at least one place for an eminent man of science. He is a mathematician of European reputation. M. Jean Richepin, who owes his seat to a diligent campaign on his behalf waged by M. Paul Bourget, is more entirely the man of letters than either of his two colleagues. He has gained notable successes as poet, novelist, and dramatist. His early volumes, "Les Caresses," "Les Blasphèmes," and "La Mer," are open to the charge of extravagance, but contain some fine verses. M. Henri de Régnier and M. Edmond Haraucourt, who also presented themselves, are certain to be elected at an early date.

* * *

BOOKS TO BE READ:—

"The Letters of Martin Luther." Selected and translated by Margaret A. Currie. (Macmillan. 12s. net.)

"The Royal House of Stuart from its Origin to the Accession of the House of Hanover." By Samuel Cowan. (Greening. Two Vols. 42s. net.)

"Records of Stirring Times, 1726-1822." By the Authoress of "Old Days in Diplomacy." (Heinemann. 10s. net.)

"Famous French Salons." By Frank Hamel. (Methuen. 12s. 6d. net.)

"Portuguese Architecture." By Walter Crum Watson. (Constable. 25s. net.)

"A Century of Political Development." By Hector Macpherson. (Blackwood. 3s. 6d. net.)

"Foreign Solutions of Poor Law Problems." By Edith Sellers. (Horace Marshall. 2s. 6d. net.)

"The Dawn of the Constitution (A.D. 1216-1307)." By Sir James H. Ramsay. (Sonnenschein. 12s. net.)

"Romantic Tales from the Punjab, with Indian Nights' Entertainment." By Charles Swynnerton. (Constable. 6s. net.)

"Adam Cast Forth: A Sacred Drama in Five Songs." By Charles M. Doughty. (Duckworth. 4s. 6d. net.)

"Many Junes." By Archibald Marshall. (Methuen. 6s.)

"The Metropolis." By Upton Sinclair. (Arnold. 6s.)

"Histoire générale du Théâtre en France." Tome III. La Comédie: Dix-septième Siècle. Par Eugène Lintilhac. (Paris: Flammarion. 3 fr. 50.)

Letters to the Editor.

THE URGENCY OF WOMEN'S ENFRANCHISEMENT.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Your admirable article on "The Sex War," in your issue of January 25th, gave expression to so clear and sympathetic an understanding of the issues that are at present dividing men and women, that we felt if the majority of men could be brought to adopt the same view, the breach would soon be healed, and men and women would be found working together in equal comradeship in the life of the family, the city, and the State.

And, again, in your article on "The Obstacle to Woman Suffrage" of last week, almost every possible argument against Woman Suffrage is most skilfully handled and finally disposed of by the assertion of the democratic principle, with all its logical implications, to which Liberalism has pledged itself, and without which its life cannot be sustained.

It is disappointing, therefore, to find that the writer, after dealing so effectively with the belated survivals of prejudice against the enfranchisement of women, and after asserting the reasonableness of having the judgment of women brought to bear upon the full and free discussion of questions affecting the State, disclaims "urgency" for the question. Possibly the writer has been misled by the letter of "Woman Liberal" in your issue of February 29th. We should be sorry to think that that letter represented the views of Liberal women generally. Both writers alike evidently do not fully grasp the real significance of the vote to women. They fail to see that it is the urgency of social reform that constitutes the urgency of Women's Suffrage.

Women are quite ready to admit that the "problems of education, temperance, unemployment, and poverty" are more important than the vote itself, and it is because they want to bring their power to bear upon these pressing causes that they claim the vote now—as a means to these great ends. In order of time, but not of importance, the means must come first.

No Government can deal justly and effectively with great measures which affect the whole people of the country whilst it grants to only one-half of that human life the power to express their needs and opinions through direct representation, and keeps the other half silent and without the power of appeal.

Women are often charged with selfishly pressing their claim first for their own enfranchisement, "regardless," as the article says, "of a broad consideration of the interests of the democratic cause." This is a misunderstanding of the position. Women are keenly interested in all efforts for social organisation, but at present women are politically non-existent, and, therefore, cannot work effectively in these causes, their moral influence being nullified by their want of political power. Women's enfranchisement is not "one among a number of causes equally just, and, in some cases, more pressing." It is on an altogether different footing. It is an appeal for political life, in order that that life may be given to these great causes.

The Liberal Government seems blind to what it is losing in depriving itself of the advocacy of women in these questions. If the energy, the tact, the cleverness, the enthusiasm, the self-sacrifice, which are now being used (or shall we say wasted?) in trying to get an opportunity of serving the Commonwealth as citizens, could be devoted to the work itself—with the additional enlightenment and inspiration that such an opportunity would give—what a strength and support the Government would find the women of England to be in their difficult work of social and political reconstruction! As it is, the Government is alienating the very power that is waiting anxiously to help it, and it is ignorant as to the extent of its loss.

Then, again, the denial of the suffrage to women is not an "injustice on the same footing" as the electoral irregularities which affect men. We are most anxious that these should be set right; but, unjust though they are, they do not disfranchise a whole sex and deprive all men of political life. Hence the superior urgency of the women's cause.

The article further says, "The question of suffrage could not be dealt with unless it had had a foremost place among the subjects under discussion at a General Election." This reminds one of Mr. Asquith's vicious circle, to which the "Daily News" thus drew attention; "Mr. Asquith explains to an important and representative deputation (The National Union of Women's Suffrage Societies) that the Government can do nothing for want of a mandate. Mr. Asquith will not ask for a mandate. He will reckon nothing as a mandate unless he has asked for it." How, then, can this question become a living issue at elections unless the Ministers are willing to bring it before the country? The women themselves, not having that means of appeal, which alone stirs to action—the vote—lack the power to do it. Hence the need for urgency in making this question part of the Government programme.

To sum up: It is because Woman's Franchise deals with the root question of political existence; it is because women cannot work effectively in social and political reform until they do exist politically; it is because the nation, in its imperative demand for better conditions of life, has great need of women's power to effect social amelioration—it is because of these reasons that the question of women's enfranchisement is one of supreme "urgency." And it is this view of the case, and no mere narrow-minded self-consideration, that leads Liberal women to refuse to spend their strength for the Liberal cause until the legitimate, recognised, effectual instrument for work—the vote—be granted to them. Then they will throw themselves heartily and intelligently into the work of social and political reform.—Yours, &c.,

KATE A. HESSEL.

Hampstead, N.W.
March 10th, 1908.

COMPENSATION FOR THE PUBLICAN.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In your issue of Saturday last, you state that with a view to influencing opinion in favour of the Licensing Bill, publicans should be informed that under Mr. Asquith's scheme they are for the first time admitted to a share in the compensation fund. This, of course, is an attempt to drive a wedge between brewer and publican, and absolutely untrue, as any enquiry into the apportionment of compensation on refusal of renewal of licensed houses will show, under the Act of 1904.—Yours, &c.,

LAWRENCE L. SAVILL.

St. Stephen's Club,
March 10th, 1908.

[The statement to which our correspondent refers is not quite accurate as it stands, but it is perfectly true that this Bill treats the licence-holder far more liberally than did the Act of 1904. Under it he will get reasonable compensation for his loss of profits, which he never received before. The licence-holder's share of compensation fund averages less than eleven per cent. of the total.—ED. NATION.]

WEAK POINTS IN THE CHILDREN'S BILL.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The Children's Bill, introduced by Mr. Herbert Samuel, contains two important provisions, dealing respectively with the deaths of children from burning in rooms with unguarded fireplaces, and of infants from overlying. Unfortunately, one of these provisions is so worded that it is likely to be entirely inoperative; while in regard to both of them there are strong reasons for doubting whether the ordinary methods of criminal procedure are applicable.

Clauses 13 and 14, containing these provisions, run as follows:—

"If any person over the age of sixteen years, who has the custody, charge, or care of any child under the age of seven years, allows that child to be in any room containing an open fire-grate, not sufficiently protected to guard against the risk of the child being burnt or scalded, and without taking reasonable precautions against that risk, and by reason thereof the child is killed or suffers serious injury, he shall, on summary conviction, be liable to a fine not exceeding ten pounds."

"If any person causes the death of an infant under the age of three years by overlying it, that person shall, on summary conviction, be liable to a fine not exceeding ten pounds, or, if the court is satisfied from the evidence that the person who caused the death was under the influence of drink at the time, to a fine not exceeding twenty-five pounds, or, alternatively, or in default of payment of such fine, or in addition thereto, to imprisonment, with or without hard labour, for any term not exceeding three months."

The second of these clauses aims at reducing a mortality which amounts to about 1,500 annually in England and Wales, and it is of the highest importance that it should be free from ambiguity. It is much to be regretted, therefore, that so ill-defined a term as "overlying" should have been employed. There is no statutory definition of the word, and no definition is included in the Bill. It is far too vague to be used for criminal purposes. In the Judicial Statistics issued by the Home Office from returns furnished by the coroners, such deaths are tabulated under the heading, "Children suffocated whilst in bed with their parents or others"; and the Registrar-General uses the same phraseology. Of our leading authorities on Medical Jurisprudence, Professor Glaister gives no definition, but in his tables speaks of "infants found dead in bed beside their parents." Professor Dixon Mann defines overlying as "suffocation by the mother encroaching on her infant," and deals with smothering by the bedclothes separately. Dr. Wynn Westcott, on the other hand, in a paper read before the Medico-Legal Society, does not discriminate between deaths from overlying and deaths of infants in bed with their parents.

To those who are unfamiliar with the coroner's court, the difficulty will not be obvious. To overlie, they will say, clearly has the meaning given by the "Standard" Dictionary, "to suffocate by lying upon," and such an act will now become a statutory offence. If this meaning is to be accepted, then it is safe to say that the clause will be practically useless, for the reasons that, firstly, it is only in a very small proportion of cases possible to prove that there was actual lying upon the child by the mother; and, secondly, that a large number of deaths of infants in bed take place without actual overlying having occurred, but for which the parent or nurse is morally responsible.

Undoubtedly it sometimes happens that a mother, while asleep, or (rarely) in a state of drunkenness, rolls over on to her infant and suffocates it. In a few of these cases there will be signs of pressure on the infant; but if this evidence is not forthcoming, how will it be possible to prove overlying? Even when present, it is not conclusive, for the mother may have rolled on to an already dead infant. But probably what happens much more frequently is that the mother goes to sleep while in the act of suckling her child, and wakes to find it dead on her arm. In such a case, it may have been suffocated by the breast, which would be overlying in the dictionary sense; but it may equally well have been asphyxiated beneath the bedclothes, which, according to Professor Dixon Mann, is smothering, and not overlying. Death may even occur without any physical contact between the mother and child at all. The mother, perhaps, has placed the child beside her with its head on the pillow; during the night it slips down, so as to lie upon the mattress, and the mother, moving about in her sleep, pulls the bedclothes over the head of the child and smothers it.

The introduction of the word "overlying" is, however, quite unnecessary in this connection, and the object of the clause is far more likely to be attained if its use be avoided. This can be done by wording the clause in some such way, as follows:—"If an infant die from suffocation while in bed with any person, that person shall," &c. The position then is, that an adult takes an infant to bed with her at her risk. It is presumably impossible to make it an offence in itself for an adult to take a child to bed with her, though this would be the ideal; but the offence would arise if, having done so, the child dies from suffocation in consequence. It will be seen that this is the principle adopted in the previous clause with regard to death from burning. The offence is not committed by allowing a child to be in a room with an unguarded fire (again the ideal, but presumably impossible); it only comes into existence when the child under such circumstances has been burnt or scalded. If the clause is worded as suggested above, all difficulties connected with the use of the word overlying will disappear, while the fact that a woman is running a risk of committing an offence simply by taking a child to bed with her will operate as a deterrent to such conduct.

As regards both these new offences, the application of existing methods of criminal procedure presents serious difficulties. Those who have made a study of the coroner's courts are well aware that in the great majority of cases where an infant has been suffocated in bed or burnt to death, the mother is already more than sufficiently punished by the loss of her child. Only in a minute proportion of the cases can the view be entertained that the death was desired for the sake of insurance money or in order to have one less mouth to fill. Mr. Walter Schröder has often expressed the opinion that nearly all such deaths arise from an over-anxiety of the mother to keep her child warm or to be certain that she will awake when it cries. By far the larger number are undoubtedly accidental, and the distress of the mother is often painful to witness, for, in addition to the loss of her child, she has the poignant anguish of feeling that she herself has been the cause of the suffering and death of her little one. Common humanity, therefore, will forbid, in such cases, the infliction of anything like a heavy penalty under the new Act. But the offence has been committed, and, as a warning and deterrent to others, must not be completely overlooked. In practice, therefore, it will happen that merely nominal fines will be inflicted, not with a view to punishment, but simply to emphasise to others the risk that now will be run by failing to take simple precautions.

Consider now the steps which will be necessary before this result is arrived at. A child has been burnt to death, let us say. The Coroner directs that an inquest be held. Witnesses are summoned, a jury is impanelled, and after an exhaustive inquiry, a verdict is returned that the death was due to the child's clothing being accidentally set alight at an unguarded fire. But the case in future will not end here. The weeping mother now goes before a magistrate; she has once more to go through the painful ordeal of a public examination, this time from the dock; witnesses are again required to attend; the State is put to further expense; time is spent in hearing evidence already given; and in the end a small fine is inflicted. Is it too much to suggest that a Coroner, who has already the power to order an arrest, to commit for trial for murder or manslaughter, and to fine defaulting jurymen or witnesses, should be further empowered to inflict a fine never to be more than ten pounds and rarely likely to be more than a few shillings?

It is not proposed to interfere with the jurisdiction of the magistrate beyond recognising that when the Coroner has inflicted a fine further proceedings shall cease. If the Coroner did not inflict a fine it would still be open to the police to take action. The Coroner would thus at his discretion be able to remit to the magistrate the very few cases in which a more serious view might be taken, such, for instance, as second offences and cases in which drunkenness was proved.

When a person is charged before a Court of Summary Jurisdiction with a serious crime, he may be committed for trial, for it is rightly held that an offence involving severe punishment should be submitted to a high judicial tribunal. But where the offence is of so small a character that the maximum penalty is a fine of ten pounds, it seems entirely superfluous to hold two enquiries concerning it. It is strongly urged that these two new offences will be so closely and intimately associated with deaths which are now the subject of investigation in the Coroner's Court that it is both in accordance with humanity and expediency that the Coroner should be empowered to deal with them there, and to inflict the fines where deserved.—Yours, &c.,

W. A. BREND.

43, Campden Hill Court, Kensington, W.

OUR "NATIONAL" GAMES.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Rightly considered, few phrases hold us in greater servitude than "national games"; the problem which cries out for solution is how to nationalise them. With a large section of society it is a commonplace that an athletic craze exists which menaces all serious vocations, and "the playing-fields of Eton" are only mentioned to point a warning that playing-fields have become an obstacle in the path of the good citizen. So easy a generalisation has serious dangers, for the half-truths which it contains prevent us from diagnosing the malady which does, in fact, afflict us. The evil is that games are not with us enough; that cricket and football—for we may ignore tennis and golf, hockey and lacrosse as the pastimes of the comparatively few—are now not played by the great bulk of the nation. We are becoming a nation of spectators, not of players; our two great games are slowly verging towards the conditions of the prize-ring, the race-course, and the bull-fight. We are, of course, far off as yet from that unhappy end; every county and large town has many clubs and teams which, with varying degrees of skill, play for the sole pleasure of the game. But can anyone doubt that year by year a greater proportion of the boys and youths who, on leaving school, should, alike for health and recreation, spend summer evenings and the Saturday afternoons of winter in some vigorous game, are drifting into the passive part of watchers at an entertainment given by proficient players, professional or amateur?

Professional or amateur, for what does it matter whether the entertainment which draws some thousand men away from healthy exercise during the only hours reserved to them from confined toil in the factory or office be given by a salaried "artiste," or a genuine amateur, or one who accepts wages under some other name? The amateur, indeed, is often one of the least intelligent students of our "national games." Professionalism is to him a "noon-day vice," to use Browne's phrase, a "brazen-browed iniquity," to be combated at every point. An excellent campaign; but what are his chief weapons? He must, says he to himself, rouse national interest in the game, and so he brings Colonial and foreign teams to tour through the country, and dispense the pure milk of the word to the lukewarm and the erring. How many converts, one wonders, has he made? A few, perhaps, and no doubt he has quickened our interest in the fresher life and quick initiative of our Colonial kinsmen. But look at the other side of the account. In all, hundreds of thousands of able-bodied youths and men have flocked to see these matches; many of the younger among them, unable or disinclined to watch professional teams, contract the point of view of the habitual spectator; many a player is taught, not the virtues of sport for its own sake, but that the "gates" to be obtained offer a profitable investment for his skill. The motives which led to the recent visits of the New Zealand and South African Rugby teams were admirable; yet what but they, with their huge "gates," led to the recent tour in Lancashire and Yorkshire of the professional New Zealand team, which was, we were told, to "revive" the Northern Union—"revive" in the sense of drawing more and more of the people from the playing of a healthy game? The Imperialist, too, must bear a share of responsibility, for the proposed cricket tournament between South Africa, Australia, and this country can only magnify the evils of which we are complaining. It is quite true that these events have a certain definite Imperial value, but they accentuate a malady already serious enough, and that is a heavy price to pay. Of course, a Saturday afternoon spent at a cricket or a football match is not completely lost. It is recreation, and it is cheap, as are the music-halls, and it offers a greater quantity of fresh air than they; often, too, it involves a brisk walk from and to the ground. Yet, after all, it is an incalculable loss to the physique and energy of the nation that the only breathing space permitted to the great mass of its young citizens should be so largely frittered away on a series of improved music-hall turns held in the open air.

There is, of course, a remedy—the provision of counter-attractions. The boy from the elementary school frequents the "tuppenny side" of the local club, because he has no club of his own to join, no field of his own on which to play; his comrades of the average secondary school pay a little more to watch the same team, because they have not the energy or means, nor their elders the foresight and enterprise, to organise them into clubs. No doubt, it would be a gigantic task to find playing-fields for that part of a great cricket or football crowd which is capable of playing the game. Take a great city where a team in the First Division of the League draws 20,000 spectators every time it plays at home. How many might be playing if they had only been given the opportunity ever since they left school? Perhaps one in five; more probably, one in four. Accept the lower figure; then 4,000 mere spectators should be engaged in healthful exercise. But that means that provision must be made for some 180 pairs of teams; and, of course, there are others who do not frequent the football or cricket ground only because they have not the money to purchase their admission. Can facilities be given for so many would-be players, for we assume that almost all boys physically capable of taking part in games would do so, were the opportunity given them? The assumption is not unreasonable, for both in elementary and secondary schools the proportion of boys who decline to play either for their class or school is uniformly small. Facilities can be given, but only by a co-operative effort of individuals, of social and religious institutions, and of municipal bodies. Lads' Clubs and Playing-Fields Societies are already doing something; but often they receive scanty assistance from the employers of labour who might well recognise the importance of the work. Recently, in one great manufacturing town, such a society appealed for aid to several hundred employers, and received a single favourable reply. Probably those to whom the appeal was made believe in their hearts that "we have far too much athletics nowadays, sir," and so refuse the working youth or the dweller in the slum his only opportunity of playing his favourite game. The provision of playing-grounds and the organisation of athletic clubs open a fine field for the amateur who desires to propagate the true principles of sport—and the municipality should support him. Local authorities have certain powers and opportunities to encourage games, and even the most economical Ratepayers' Association would scarcely begrudge a moderate expenditure on such an object.

I may suggest that there is another influence which should be brought into action, and that is the churches. With them cricket is accepted as the most respectable of games; even the strictest of Nonconformist Sunday-schools may have its cricket club. But football is often classed with billiards; it has the taint of gambling about it—the more it is boycotted by the churches the greater will the gambling taint become, as recent prosecutions tend to show—and so the youth who in the summer may play for Salem Cricket Club must spend his winter holidays in watching skilled professionals or amateurs perform. And yet one cannot see why football is not as respectable a buttress to the churches as are some other of their activities to-day. If every church had its football team or teams, if every Education Committee co-operated with schoolmasters and Lads' Clubs to lease or purchase fields and organise the youth of the neighbourhood, taking them while they still have some of the enthusiasm of boyhood left, then we should see the crowds at our great athletic contests dwindling, the pay and expenses of the players would shrink to humbler dimensions, the attraction to young "talent" would be less, and we should be the healthier and happier for genuine national games. That cannot come without great effort. But it might come.—Yours, &c.,

A PLAYER.

March 9th, 1908.

THE KAISER'S LETTER.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—“The incident of the German Emperor's letter may be regarded as closed.” It is so that the “Daily News” begins its article of yesterday on the subject. Lord Rosebery expressed the general feeling of England by describing the idea that the Emperor should have attempted, in a private letter to Lord Tweedmouth, to exercise any influence upon the progress of British armaments, as “supremely ridiculous.”

And yet the “incident” has a side that deserves more attention than it has yet received.

Lèse-majesté is a word of fear in Berlin. It is hardly understood in England. We usually explain the prosecutions we read of by supposing that the Emperor is unduly susceptible on the score of his personal dignity. But, as Lord Rosebery says, he is “a potentate of remarkable intelligence.” It is far more probable that he believes ridicule to be a serious danger. Disrespect is a weapon which he has not the slightest intention of allowing his subjects to use against himself. "Don't monkey with your character," says a little book, "Get On, or Get Out," which is just now making a great noise. "Ridicule is very often a sharp sword for your defeat." Given the present condition of Germany, the Emperor is probably wise.

But he is a German. He has the creation of a powerful navy at heart, and he knows that success in his darling ambition must depend ultimately upon the spirit he can infuse into the German people, "mostly fools," as Carlyle said of the English. He is convinced of the power of the weapon of disrespect. Is it doing him any very great wrong to suppose that he is not unwilling to use it for the depreciation, in the eyes of "the German Michael," of the rival navy which dogs the development of his own, with the avowed purpose of maintaining a constant superiority?

Take Lord Rosebery's view of the "incident," which, of course, minimises its importance. A "bantering letter" was written by the Emperor to the First Lord of the Admiralty on the subject of naval affairs. To this the recipient, after consultation with a colleague, "replied with as much of a tone as near to banter as one in his situation could employ to the German Emperor." "Tu pulsas, ego vapulo tantum." A bout of single-stick with Imperial Royalty is rather a one-sided pastime. But when the fact of the encounter is advertised, it can hardly fail to be also humiliating. The correspondent of the "Daily Mail" wrote on the 8th that "the Kaiser's letter was known to several members of the Diplomatic Corps" at Berlin, and that "he told several acquaintances that he had written to Lord Tweedmouth." The Uebermuth (I use the milder German word in preference to its English equivalent) of their ruler is a subject of pride to the German populace. Had a German caricature then appeared representing the Emperor as an autocratic nurse, with the First Lord of the British Admiralty across her knee receiving manual correction, while the rest of the members of the British Cabinet awaited their turn, finger in mouth, it would probably have roused a shriek of rapture. The unresented vapulation of Lord Tweedmouth might not have "launched a thousand ships," but it would pretty certainly have put another German "Dreadnought" or two upon the stocks. We do, after all, owe something to the "Times."

Grandiloquence is "bad form." To talk about the "majesty of the English People" would be to provoke a sneer. Yet Leviathan (the nation personified) does possess a personal dignity of exactly as much defensive value as the "majesty" of Royalty is to those whom it encircles. And this is committed to the trust of those who are chosen, in a pre-eminent manner, to "represent" the People, to stand in its place, and speak with its voice. The "situation" (to use Lord Rosebery's word) of the First Lord of the Admiralty is not that of a footman, with whom a great man may use the liberty of "banter" at his pleasure. He carries the character of England, and he is entitled to receive as his due, from every man upon the face of the earth, a respect not inferior to the dignity of his charge.

Lord Tweedmouth is not responsible in any way for the lèse majesté committed upon the English people in his person. No levity of bearing on his part invited it, his subsequent action was considered and not injudicious. Yet I could have wished that instead of receiving "banter" with humility, he had himself brought the letter to the notice of Parliament, and, in doing so, had laid down of his own motion the great employment that he holds. Not as having in any, even the smallest, particular brought disgrace upon it himself, but because without his will and beyond his power of prevention, its dignity during his tenure of office had suffered abatement. To have done so would have been to take a place in the future history of England's relations with foreign Powers as conspicuous as that held by Mr. Speaker Lenthall in the annals of our Parliamentary development.

Let us hope that the dignity of England may be consulted by the establishment of an unwritten rule that every private communication made by a foreign potentate to an English Minister may, as a matter of course, be laid at once before the House of Commons.—Yours, &c.,

March 11th, 1908.

LÆUS.

THE RUSH FOR SMALL HOLDINGS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—No one, I imagine, would expect that every individual county councillor would be enthusiastically in favour of the policy of the Small Holdings Act of last year. The important point is whether the county councils are carrying out their duties under the Act. I asserted that they were, and I am very glad to find, from Mr. Impey's second letter, that he does not dispute that statement, which has since been completely confirmed by those best able to judge.

On February 12th, Lord Carrington said in the House of Lords that he desired to express his most warm thanks to the county councils for the workmanlike manner in which they had met the extra work placed on them by the Small Holdings Act; while, in a printed answer to a question by Mr. Corrie Grant, Sir Edward Strachey said: "So far as the Board are as yet able to judge, the statutory committees are in almost every case carrying out their duties with energy and despatch, and land-owners in all parts of the country appear ready to assist in the matter. We have every reason to be satisfied up to the present with the way in which the Act is working."

I hope that Mr. Impey will not think that I am directing my remarks to him if I venture to suggest that it would be likely to facilitate matters considerably if the above statements were brought to the notice of everyone throughout the country, rather than if it be continually asserted, as it is in some quarters, that the county councils are all reactionary bodies, from whom nothing is to be hoped.—Yours, &c.,

G. MONTAGU HARRIS.

Caxton House, Tothill Street,
Westminster, S.W.

February 19th, 1908.

THE PRESERVATION OF MEWS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—A most serious proposal will be voted upon at the next meeting of the Marylebone Borough Council. It covers twenty-five mews in Marylebone, which Mr. F. W. Hunt, agent to the Portman Estate, claims to be the property of Viscount Portman, and invites the borough to yield up to the estate.

For nearly a century these twenty-five mews have been drained, paved, cleansed, and lighted by the public authorities, at the expense of the ratepayers. The public have used them, and now naturally regard them as public property. Should they be surrendered to Lord Portman to be closed and built upon, a great loss of air, space, and light will ensue. They are, in fact, one of the most valuable sanitary assets in Marylebone or in London, and everything possible should be done to avoid the dire calamity of their loss. In some other cases a decision against the interests of the public and in favour of Lord Portman has been given by one Judge of the High Court, but so gravely are the people of Marylebone concerned in what is now sought to be done that they should seriously consider whether they should be content short of a judgment by the Court of Appeal or the House of Lords.

All round us huge piles of flats and other buildings are being heaped up on plots of ground, which are limited in area to a degree positively dangerous to the public welfare. Are the mews to be sacrificed for the sake of the mere accumulation of wealth, regardless of the health and comfort of the people of Marylebone?

One of the results of London being divided up into twenty-nine portions for purposes of local government is that the Marylebone Council has the burden of fighting this battle, although, if it be fought and won in Marylebone, the result will affect a vast number of mews in various parts of London. If these mews can be kept open, they will advantageously influence the health of the metropolis of the Empire.

Steps should be taken forthwith to interest the City and every one of the twenty-nine Borough Councils, and Parliament,—Yours, &c.,

HARLEY STREET, CAVENDISH SQUARE, W.

March 7th, 1908.

Reviews.

THE ELIZABETHAN ABROAD.*

FYNES MORYSON (born 1566) was a Lincolnshire gentleman (a fellow of Peterhouse, Cambridge) who planned, in his eighteenth year (with the common Elizabethan precocity) to travel over Europe, so that he might write her social history. After five years of grave preparation (during which he learned to speak French, German, and Italian) he went to Europe, where he remained from 1591 till 1595, visiting, in that time, Holland, Germany, Italy, and France. Spain, unfortunately, he could not visit, owing to the war. Not feeling satisfied with this gust of the world, and having besides a wish to see the Holy Land, he sailed abroad again, at the end of 1595, in the company of his brother Henry. On this second journey he went through Germany to Venice, where he took ship for the Near East. After visiting Jerusalem and Antioch (on which visit Henry Moryson died of dysentery), he returned by way of Constantinople, reaching London in July, 1597. In 1598 he visited Edinburgh, and perhaps (as Mr. Charles Hughes conjectures) the Scottish Court, as a secret agent in the pay of the Earl of Essex. In 1600 he followed Lord Mountjoy into Ireland, where he saw the progress and slow suppression of Tyrone's rising. Shortly after his arrival in Ireland, he became Mountjoy's chief secretary, a post which he retained till 1606, when Mountjoy (then the Earl of Devonshire) died. In 1617 he published (in folio) the Itinerary here reprinted. After this, he passed some years in writing that "Part IV." of his Itinerary which was first published (with much very necessary abridgment) by Mr. Charles Hughes, a few years ago. Little is known of his later years, but they were probably peaceful and uneventful. He never married. His love for brother and sister is the only great emotion mentioned in his book. But he is always careful to reveal very little of himself; so perhaps we are deceived by the dim, cold, aloof manner in which he writes of women. He died on February 12th, 1630, ignorant, probably, as many of the Elizabethans were, that his age had been remarkable for anything, except perhaps the murder of Henri Quatre, and the spread of Romanism in Ireland.

It was his misfortune to pass his intense years in secret service. Of the interesting people known to him, and of the main interests (all political) of his prime, he can tell us nothing; his lips are sealed. He is therefore a tantalising, almost irritating writer. We keep thinking that his book is a blind. It is not the whole man; it is not the best of the man. We feel that all his intensest life is being hidden from us; and that this heavy book of his is a thick wall, shutting us at once from his own inner nature and from the past, as we wish to see it. Apart from his secretaryship, he was too unimaginative to take a strong hold upon life. As a traveller he saw life as a succession of pictures passing before him. It may be very strange, or very curious, as he describes it; but it is never very real, since it always lies without him. When Moryson ceased to be a traveller, in the flowering time of his maturity he became a private secretary, in whom discretion was the better part of the imagination. Had he been an imaginative man he would have delighted more in life; he would have shown a more noble eagerness in tasting the world. He had courage, shrewdness, seriousness, but his great gift was discretion; his eyes, we are certain, never rolled in a fine frenzy. They were downcast, like a Jesuit's eyes, while his alert mind took in unceasingly under the mask of the face.

When we consider what he must have known, living, as he lived, a trusted man, in the circles of high Elizabethan politics, and compare it with what he has told us, he becomes almost romantic. There is no trace of romance in his sober, gentlemanly histories; he is too discreet for that; yet he saw, and perhaps shared in, all the great romance of the romantic time. Mountjoy's mistress was that Lady Rich who had once been Sidney's Stella. Moryson must have known much of that strange and melancholy love affair. He must also have been behind the scenes of many of the many plots which filled the minds of the Essex faction during the last few years of Elizabeth's life. He must have known the Earl of Essex; he must often have been in the presence of Tyrone. He must have known the secret history of the accession of James I., a very interesting chapter, surely, in the unwritten chronicles of the Kings. He must have known Southampton. Possibly he knew who Mr. W. H. was. Moving in such society he may have met Shakspeare. One feels sure that he must, at least, have seen him act. As we might expect of a gentleman and a private secretary, he is silent on all these matters. It is a pity that, instead of all these things, he tells us the story of Tyrone's rebellion, and of the Germans' manner of life. It is all very well worth knowing, but though the events and habits of an age are interesting studies, the men and women of an age are surely much more interesting. Man is greater than his acts, and infinitely greater than the conventional rules which prescribe his dinner hour. Perhaps Moryson never realised this. We see signs in his book that, like so many travellers, he never grew up; never matured. His mind, instead of growing, turned to his past. The best ten years of his life were spent in digesting what he had learned in his two great journeys.

We can guess from a few passages in his book that his interests were in big political movements, and in shrewd, controlling, politic intellects. Whenever he could, he sought out such intellects. Apparently, important political figures were then as easy of access as the American politician in our own time. He seems to have "met" Bellarmine by hanging about his gates till he came home. He "met" Beza and Cardinal Allen (though not, unfortunately, together) in much the same free and easy way. We cannot help thinking, from one passage, that he even "met" Henri Quatre: but the passage is not very clear. It is not improbable. Henri was only too easy to meet: the gallant, liberal man. Anyone could meet Henri by slipping on a petticoat and walking past the palace.

Moryson describes both Bellarmine and Beza, not very fully, but yet with interesting details, which make the men real to us. He tells us that Beza once reproved him, in godly sort, for tapping the poor-box on leaving church. He had got into a way of doing the like in Italy with the holy water dish, and he tells us what Beza said, thinking that it may tend to Christian edification. With these exceptions he tells us nothing of interest of either of these men; nor can we learn from him what he thought of them, except that they were both worth meeting. We are left staring at the wall of his discretion. He tells us, as it were, that he has Beza in his heart, and that that fact, not the revealed image of Beza, must suffice us. We learn from these early scraps of self-revelation how intensely he must have enjoyed his life with Mountjoy, in the inner circles of a great political movement. Of this enjoyment, keen as it no doubt was, he tells us nothing. His words are the discreet, restrained, sober words of one who has dug up all his facts from the unindexed State papers at the Record Office. He has moments of enthusiasm. He describes the siege of Kinsale with all the colour of simplicity; it is one of the best things he ever wrote. His hatred of dirty disorder makes him eloquent against the Irish in more than one amusing passage. Being a very honest man, he writes finely against the scandalous commissariat department of Mountjoy's army. Once, for two or three intense pages, he describes his master, Mountjoy, from his "something bald" crown to his "leggs somewhat little, which hee gartered ever above the knee." His other enthusiastic passages are chiefly directed against the Church of Rome. For the rest he is a mild, polite secretary, with eyes always downcast (having been taught humility by the Turks in his travels abroad), and his mind always rather anxious about his bodily health. He had good health, we conclude, except in one unmentionable particular, of which we have shy hints every now and then, enough to convince us of his affliction.

He is an unequal writer. On the whole he is a less companionable figure than Coryat; for Coryat, with all his buffoonery and vulgarity, his delight in the Heidelberg Tun and his admiration for "goodlie" gallowses, had a capacity for enjoying, which shows in his writing. Moryson, a much deeper man, hides his emotion. He is politic and critical, where Coryat is going out to see courtesans (honi soit) or to have himself drawn, standing (as he once gloriously stood), on the Tun itself. On the whole, too, we find him less of a person than William Lithgow. He is always eluding us, however interesting his matter may be. It is very like the man as we picture him, that he should have travelled so often by himself, and in disguise.

* "Fynes Moryson's Itinerary." Glasgow: MacLehose & Sons. Four vols. 50s. net.

He was not artistic. His book is arranged clumsily, with a carelessness strange in so formal a man. He often repeats himself, telling one tale three times, and several others twice. He took no pleasure in Elizabethan poetry. Probably few people did, except the Elizabethan poets. He has nothing to say about the Elizabethan stage, except that it was better managed than the Italian stage. As for the players, he classes them, disgustingly, more than once, with cutpurses and bankrupts. Like most men without ideas, he took a pleasure in proverbs, and popular generalisations, of which he gathered together some hundred, not without criticism:—

"In conversation, the Germans are said to be imperious and intollerable (I should say they are peaceable when they are sober, and diversely affected, according to their severall natures, when they are drunken), the French mild (I would rather say trifeling and cerimonious), the Spaniards wary, the Italians wise."

He is generally just in his criticisms; but the Roman Church and the Turks make him to lose his temper. Neither Romans nor Turks ever got much justice from the Elizabethans. Now and then he says something which makes us ashamed, and conscious of loss. We can no longer flaunt his proud boast that:—

"the conversation of the English abroad, is wonderfullie pleasing unto strangers."

Not that the English were universally pleasing unto strangers in Moryson's time. In Hamburg, for instance, they did "raile on English-men":—

"For that which we call warre at sea, and the royall Navy, that they terme robbery and Pirats ships."

We like those other naiveties of his, in which he tells of the simplicity of English life in his day, when one had but two daily meals, which one ate without forks. But better than anything we like his "Discourse upon severall heads" (vol. III., p. 349), a piece of prose on which we should like to enlarge. As for travel in general, the subject of the discourse, "I passe over the abundant fruits it yieldeth," because Moryson, notwithstanding his disclaimer, has written a notable fifty pages on them, covering the ground pretty thoroughly, "as the sunne by his beames." Neither can we, in this place, advise on the necessity for travel, according to the natures of men; for in this, too, our author has been wittie, quoting the poet Claudian, and what Suetonius saith of Cæsar, with the most airy light effect, yet aptly. We will, however, endorse his advice to Angelica, "if she were alive in these dayes, not to trust her selfe alone and in desert places to the protection of wandering Knights, less shee meete with more strong encounters, than was that of the weake Hermite."

But, as Moryson says, "Me thinkes I have said enough." Moryson and the life he saw, and the wandering knights who robbed him, are as dead as we shall be three centuries hence. May the books we leave behind us be as honest as his, and, if it may be, a little brighter reading. And may we all remember, with him, in his one truly poetical sentence, that "Wee are Citizens of the whole World; yea, not of this World, but of that to come."

HOW PLEASANT TO KNOW MR. LEAR!*

MANY who remember the admirable poem in which Mr. Edward Lear professed to describe his own personality will probably prefer it to the longer account of him in prose, excellently edited by Lady Strachey. It is not supremely important to know where Edward Lear was born, or what were his views on politics; but the information conveyed in the line—

"He weareth a runcible hat" is really solid and important. It was also essential to appreciate the distinction involved in the words—

"He reads, but he cannot speak Spanish,
He cannot abide Ginger Beer."

* "Letters of Edward Lear." Edited by Lady Strachey. T. Fisher Unwin 15s.

And, after reading the poem, we were all quite ready to agree in concluding the verse:—

"Ere the days of his pilgrimage vanish
How pleasant to know Mr. Lear."

It is pleasant to know Mr. Lear, even in this excellent volume of entertaining gossip and correspondence. But it was even pleasanter to know him in that wild country in which he lived up to his poetical description. I, for one, am prepared to believe in the eternal and spiritual Edward Lear against all shows of this world and all phantoms of the flesh. I believe that "his body was perfectly spherical," and that he did verily and in truth wear a runcible hat. I will have no Modernism on this subject; or indeed on any other. Perhaps there was a sensible Edward Lear who wrote letters and criticised current affairs. But the great Edward Lear, the serious Edward Lear, was the silly one.

It is a remarkable fact that the two great English masters of nonsense in the nineteenth century were both men whose private personalities were, I will not say prosaic, but at least rational, respectable, and containing no suggestion at all either of pure poetry or of any particular oddity in humour. Lewis Carroll and Edward Lear were neither of them really people with perverse or whimsical temperaments; they were neither of them men like Charles Lamb or Robert Louis Stevenson, men who could not write ten words on a postcard without the sentence taking a sort of tender twist. The views of Edward Lear, like those of the respected don who wrote under the name of Lewis Carroll, were sensible and slightly Philistine views. It would immediately be supposed that this sane but stolid character would be somewhat unsuited for two wild poets, who were to write about the Jabberwock and the Dong with the Luminous Nose. I am not so sure that this is really the case. I go so far as to say that the solid mid-Victorian lives led by Lewis Carroll and Edward Lear had a great deal to do with their creating themselves kings of the remote empire of unreason. The simplicity and rationality of that race attracted the fairies. They had a basis, moral and material, on which the bizarre pagodas could be built. It is too little remembered that if you want to reach nonsense you must go through sense.

Of course there was a difference of degree in the two cases and even, perhaps a difference of kind. Edward Lear in these letters is not subtle, but he is exhilarating. Mr. Dodgson, in his private utterances, was neither exhilarating or subtle. But they were both very good examples of the well-informed Englishman of the mid-Victorian time. And the chief mark of the well-informed Englishman of that time was that he was an ill-informed Englishman. It is impossible to read letters such as these without feeling how insulated and provincial were the best English minds during a certain period. Here is a man of genius, a good Greek scholar, a traveller of experience, a man priding himself on the liberality of his mind; and yet he criticises all things not English as if they were indefensible eccentricities in an English village. He has the typical mid-Victorian habit of getting horribly angry with the tyrants or impostors who are not oppressing him but being perfectly genial and self-satisfied about those who really are. He breaks out, as Thackeray did, into pages of denunciation of the life of a monastery; though he does not (as Thackeray did) actually propose that monastic vows should be legally forbidden, like human sacrifice. But he does fly into a furious and sustained passion against a system which is, after all, a voluntary system, while it never occurs to him to make any protest against the dominance of the English aristocracy, which is not voluntary—except on the part of the aristocrats. A few poor old monks who have chosen to live hard lives on their own responsibility strike him as monsters of darkness and hypocrisy. "I still maintain that Blasphemy and lying are the Prerogatives of Priestcraft." But when he comes to a quite typical diplomatist and cynical oligarch like Lord Palmerston, that statesman's front bench clap-trap strikes him as "all straightforward bluff truth." Like all the English of his strange time he could have seen that the Irish were a priest-led people; but could not have seen that the English are a squire-led people. And it is surely more manly to follow the leaders of your own philosophy than merely to follow the owners of your own farms. Such are at least the letters of Edward Lear; full of broad English fun, full of splendid English high spirits. But the very broadness of the fun only illustrates the narrowness of the outlook. Even the high spirits only show the low political education. Everything that is English is liberal; especially the illiberal aristocracy. Everything that is un-English is illiberal, especially the tradition which has been the mother of all the liberal arts. Nobody wants him to go into a monastery; yet he will soothe his soul with incessant roarings against the hocus-pocus of monasteries. As if all the hocus-pocus of all the priests in history could really be much more dangerous than the hocus-pocus of Lord Palmerston.

To say this is of course to leave out of the real Edward Lear a great mass of real humour, of real liberality, and knowledge of the world. Nevertheless, if we drop the real Edward Lear and turn to the unreal one—oh, bless him, how much more real he is! The mystical Edward Lear, the one who wore the runcible hat, is one of the great masters of English literature. He has, no doubt, essential points in common with his mere earthly counterpart. When we read those criticisms of Continental religion mentioned above, we may perhaps see a deep truth in the line—

"He reads, but he cannot speak Spanish."

That was really what was the matter with the Englishman of the Lear period; he could read about foreigners, but he could not speak with them. And when we delight (as we certainly do when reading these letters) in the heartiness, the good fellowship, the Dickensian camaraderie of that fine old English world, we may add with enthusiasm the line, as if we were shouting it all together in a chorus—

"He cannot abide Ginger Beer!"

But the Lear of the nonsense world still remains a sort of super-Lear, a being far more transcendental and awful.

For the truth is that Edward Lear was greater than Lewis Carroll; at least, he could do what Lewis Carroll could not do. Lewis Carroll's nonsense was merely mathematical and logical. Edward Lear's nonsense was emotional and poetical. The long rolling lines of Lear have the feeling of fine poetry in them, which does not exist in the excellent poem of "Jabberwocky." It does exist in "Far and few, far and few,

Are the lands where the Jumbles live."

or in those splendid lines—

"When awful darkness and silence reign
Over the great Gromboolian plain,
And the angry breakers roar as they beat on the rocky shore,
And the storm clouds brood on the towering heights
Of the hills of the Chankly Bore."

No one was ever quite at home in Wonderland—not even Alice. But the English romanticism in those lines of Lear is so strong that I feel as if the Chankly Bore were in Berkshire or Sussex, and I know I am native to the Gromboolian Plain.

G. K. CHESTERTON.

A PARIS OF THE PAST.*

THE unofficial historian, guised, not in the sober uniform of science but the flowing peignoir of fashionable reminiscence, is an ever welcome visitant. The Comtesse de Boigne, whose last volume of memoirs deals with the French Restoration from 1820-30, was an assiduous collector of aristocratic gossip, a shrewd critic of political events. She discourses lightly, but significantly, of royalty and revolution, love and scandal in high places, the fall of ministries, and the fate of kings. A judicious rather than a charitable narrator, she betrays no weak indulgence for the erring of her own sex. Queen Caroline of England she censures with contempt, is none too tender with the Duchesse de Berry, and keenly ridicules the infatuated Queen of Sweden, whose pursuit of the Duc de Richelieu made her the laughing-stock of Paris. True to her race, the Comtesse shares its passionate but short-lived enthusiasms, its brisk common sense, vivacity, and defects of humour. None but a Frenchwoman, one feels, could describe with so little a sense of its absurdity the triumph in the Bourbon soul of etiquette over the natural emotions. Louis XVIII. had just expired; around his death-bed the royal family hung weeping.

* "Memoirs of the Comtesse de Boigne." Edited from the original MS. by M. Charles Nicoulaud. Heinemann. 10s. net.

"Monsieur left the room sobbing, and Madame prepared to follow him. Hitherto she had always taken precedence of her husband, as the King's daughter; when she reached the door she suddenly stopped, and through the heart-felt tears with which her face was streaming, she said with difficulty:

"Take precedence, Dauphin."

Of irony, too, her country is at times unconscious. In May, 1821, the greatest giant of the century breathed his last. The Comtesse hears the newspaper sellers crying in the streets, "The death of Napoleon Bonaparte, two sous; his speech to General Bertrand, two sous; despair of Madame Bertrand, two sous." This announcement, she adds, produced no more effect than the advertisement of a lost dog.

The Comtesse's interests are mundane and temporal; art, literature, and religion are outside her range. The political temperament has in general little sympathy with the poetical. Chateaubriand, in his later days, appears but as a perverse and peevish politician, whose fits of childish fury require all the tender ministration of Madame Recamier to assuage. The "ugly face" of Benjamin Constant, as he passes on a stretcher in the July days "in the attitude of an Opera Tancred," motioning with his hand "to still the acclamations that no one seemed to raise in his honour," seems to the Comtesse the personification of falsehood and intrigue.

Liberal in her sympathies, the Comtesse de Boigne has scant patience with the monarch who could play whist whilst Paris was burning. The revolution strengthens her Republican sentiments. For some time she had observed a marked improvement in the character of the working classes:—

"I had already been greatly struck by their intelligence, by their politeness, which was in no way servile, by their ready and scientific mode of taking their measurements, and by their chemical knowledge of the ingredients they employed. I was still more struck by their arguments concerning the danger of these fatal Ordinances, of which they understood both the range and the probable results. If our governors had been half so foresighted and prudent, King Charles X. would still be living quietly in the Tuileries."

This popular good sense was preserved in a high degree during the days of July. The order and method of the insurgents, their quiet courage and unselfish heroism are instanced in a dozen little touches by the observant great lady. Especially is she struck with the unity of organisation: "the whole of the great city seemed to be animated by one temper, one will, one plan of operation." From her window she would see a man passing down the street with a covered basket, such as cake-sellers carry; he is distributing cartridges. A cart goes by loaded with gunpowder; everybody takes some, and the women sit quietly in front of their doorsteps manufacturing bullets. The revolutionaries go from house to house politely requesting the loan of weapons. Refusals are received with the utmost meekness, and, what is more remarkable, the weapons, many of them of great value, are returned within a week to their owners.

With the events of the "noble week" the memoirs close. Sequel might possibly dull the brightness of the days nicknamed afterwards the "Glorieuses." Heine, one remembers, visited Paris in 1830, and noticed that the words "Liberté, Egalité, Fraternité," had already been erased. Honeymoons, he observed, fly so quickly!

THE NOVEL OF THE WEEK.*

IT is easier to praise Miss Robins for the brilliancy and force of her vivid pictures of life than to determine her place as a novelist. "Come and Find Me" makes a mixed appeal to her audience, for it combines the deep and genuine qualities of a work of art with the startling naturalism of a flashlight photograph. As though in response to the inconsequence of modern life, and the stress and rush of its feverish energy, the author, four years ago, struck out in "The Magnetic North" an impressionistic style of her own, one not without the alloy of journalistic cleverness. But curiously enough, the superficial side of that novel lay in the character studies, while the brilliant descriptive sketches of the mushroom town of Dawson, and its hordes of immigrants all bitten by the gold fever while heartsick for home, were literature of a rare order. In her last novel, "Come and Find Me," Miss Robins has, however, made a more perfect amalgam of her artistic gifts and journalistic powers, and the weak spots in her painting are now less patent. The novel has great breadth and atmosphere; its scope is wide-stretching, but it is flimsy in construction and very weak in its ending. In fact, it has the capital defects and the characteristic virtues of our modern system of life. It is full to overflowing, it is inexhaustible in human interest, it is formless, suggestive, and wasteful.

* "Come and Find Me." By Elizabeth Robins. Heinemann. 6s.

So loose in structure is "Come and Find Me" that we must apologise to our readers for beginning with a retrospect. Nathaniel Mar, thirty years before the story properly opens, had been shipwrecked on the Alaskan coast, and, the only survivor but one of his little party of Russian-American explorers, by chance he had stumbled across a creek in the tundra, where, after "panning" the gravel, he found gold. On his return to California, a shattered leg and a marriage for love kept him for some years from "going out there again and making sure" of his big discovery, and later on, both the geologists and the men of finance, whose backing he sought, pooh-poohed the idea that gold could be found so far north. His capable and hard-natured wife had come to hate his crazy scheme of a fortune to be made in the Northern ice-fields, and little by little Mar had become the bondsman of his family cares and straitened circumstances, though he never ceased planning and dreaming of means and methods to realise his "find." Thirty years, however, have slipped by, and then the news from Klondyke in '97 sets the whole Pacific coast afire, and Mar, turned out from his post of bank cashier by "the need for younger men," sets out for Nome, and his magic gold-shotted creek.

The family history and mental atmosphere of the Mar household during these thirty years are touched in, in a hundred pages, with fine feminine craft. The detestable American mother, Mrs. Mar, hard, sharp, energetic, with "eyes that glittered like pieces of highly-polished brown onyx" at the spectacle of "getting on," and her two sons, Trena and Harry, who have shown "business capacity from childhood," and frankly despise their father for not having "got on," are well contrasted with the girl Hildegard, warm-hearted, tranquil, and statuesque. The school-girlish prattle and sentimental outpourings of Hildegard and her bosom friend Bella, who both fall in love with the photograph of Jack Galbraith, the young Polar explorer, who is an old correspondent of Mar, are done to the life. Jack Galbraith returns from a voyage, engages himself to Bella, quarrels with her, and disappears from men's sight on another Polar expedition, and later on Hildegard's cool and resourceful adorer, Cheviot, after wooing her unsuccessfully, goes off in his turn to the Klondyke.

Miss Robins by her first hundred pages has cleverly and plausibly paved the way for her hidden design—to show forth the conflict in woman's nature through her two conflicting needs, indicated by two sayings of Hildegard, first, "The most successful and sensible women are those who have gone about most, or had some great trouble, and known about life somehow by knocking up against it," and second, "When you think what a miracle it is to find the right man in the maze, how is it that we ever let the right one go?" In Hildegard's case this double craving for life's excitement and for man's love are satisfied by the same stroke of fate. Mar, her father, on his arrival at Nome, finds that his thirty-year old secret has been filched from him and that Anvil Creek is "staked from end to end." In his chagrin, the disappointed man refuses to come home, and even Cheviot, the ever resourceful, warned by a letter on his way back from the Klondyke, fails to persuade him to flee before the deadly Arctic winter falls. When Cheviot reports his failure in person, Hildegard decides that she must go. She admits frankly to Bella that it is not "because I'm brave and a good daughter and things like that . . . it's because while other people have travelled north, south, east, and west, New York, Mexico, London, and Paris, I've stayed here in this little house in Valdivia, and sewed and gardened and only heard about the world." In vain Cheviot implores and argues, in vain he points out the dangers of the voyage, Hildegard's unfitness for it, the folly of women increasing the burden of the men, &c. Hildegard has made up her mind to go. And with a heroic determination to brave every ill and have a good time, in feminine fashion she sails for the coast town of Nome in the unspeakable steamer "Los Angeles." And, of course, the faithful and anxious lover, Cheviot, turns up in disguise on the steamer in order to watch over her safety.

The sights and sounds, the racket and hustle, the stench and confusion of the voyage of this hapless and pathetic band of nondescript emigrants, all hastening towards the El Dorado which does not exist, towards the worked-out beach of Nome, where hunger and typhoid rage, all these things are admirably, brilliantly described. Miss Robins has an extraordinary faculty for swift impressionistic sketching, and the grim actualities of this pathetic voyage are etched in in most masterly fashion. Miss Robins has placed Hildegard in the old situation, dear to a woman's heart, where her realisation of her own dependence upon the man brings out his own manly force and doubles his tenderness for her. Before the voyage is over the flag of feminine independence is lowered. By her acute sketch of the lonely, isolated, and bitter figure of Mrs. Locke, a woman who has battled with the world, and lost her illusions through "enforced close relations with men through her work," the author throws subtle shades into her picture. The book suggests that woman, like the queen bee, needs to stretch her wings in one free flight before she settles down to the duties of domesticity. Too long a flight would endanger the welfare of the nest, and, no doubt, impair the happiness of the bee! Hildegard's fate is a happy one; she asserts her independence, and then realises her dependence through love. On the whole men have more to learn from the picture than women.

The melodramatic end of the novel is unworthy of the fineness of perception shown in most of the pages. Jack Galbraith's discovery of the North Pole, his paean of Yankee patriotism, and the finding by Hildegard of the dying man in a hut on Polaris Creek, all this is but glorified journalism—a brassy solo on the Kipling trumpet. "Come and Find Me" is, indeed, typical, in its qualities and its defects, of our amazing time.

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

"A GREAT LABOUR LEADER" (Brown, Langham & Co., 15s. net), by Mr. Aaron Watson, tells the story of the life and work of a very remarkable man, with a character singularly rare in public or in private life, rich in charm and worth. Indeed, it would be hard to find anyone more representative of the best side of democratic politics than the subject of the book, Mr. Thomas Burt. Born in the year of Queen Victoria's accession, and going to work in a coal-mine when he was ten years old, Mr. Burt's qualities of character and intellect have made him a member of the Privy Council, and one of the most trusted of the representatives of the trade union movement in Parliament. The account of his early efforts at self-education show what manner of man he is. At a time when the conditions of work in the collieries were a public scandal, he spent every moment and every penny he could spare on books—we read that "on summer evenings he would be out in the fields by four o'clock, reading his Milton or his Gibbon"—with the result that he gained a knowledge of not only English literature, but French and Latin as well, which few boys take from their careers at a public school. In 1865 Mr. Burt became Secretary of the Northumberland Miners' Confident Association, at a moment when the miners were on strike and the funds amounted to only £23. When the strike ended he had largely increased the membership of the Union, and there was between £600 and £700 in hand. The workers promptly recognised that in a man of this stamp they had a born leader, and in 1874 he was returned for Morpeth as the first Labour representative in Parliament. His work since then is familiar to all who know anything of current politics. To his other gifts Mr. Burt adds singular refinement of manner. The dominating characteristic of his personality, says Mr. Maddison, in a brief introduction, is his gentleness. But he is also a man of strong convictions, who allows nothing to turn him aside from the course in which he believes. "As a politician," Mr. Maddison concludes, "he began as a Radical on the broad platform of citizenship, not class, and he stands on that stable foundation to-day." "From the ranks

A COMPLETE TRAVEL LIBRARY of over 1,000 PAGES

For 2/6 POST FREE

PROCLAIMED BY THE PRESS
TO BE THE NE PLUS ULTRA
OF RAILWAY LITERATURE.

THE DAILY TELEGRAPH says:
"Wholly admirable pictures and brightly-written letterpress well fulfil their purpose."

THE SPHERE says:
"There is not a single point of interest omitted."

THE WORLD says:
"The literary matter is of considerable merit, and the illustrations are admirable."

MADAME says:
"Both dainty and artistic, containing a mine of information written in the proper spirit of appreciation."

More than 500 beautiful photographic illustrations, including reproductions of valuable old maps and prints.

The above series of Travel Books may be obtained by sending stamps or P.O.
for 2/6 to the Superintendent of the Line,
Paddington Station, London, W.
JAMES C. INGLIS, General Manager.

G. W. R.

SIR HUBERT VON HERKOMER and PUBLIC OPINION

Sir Hubert Herkomer, the distinguished artist, writing from Bushey to the Editor of PUBLIC OPINION, says, on February 11th, 1908:—

Dear Sir—It gives me great pleasure to tell you how your paper,
PUBLIC OPINION, answers a purpose in my life. Although
I read a great deal, I find it impossible to keep abreast of the trend of higher thought that is going on around me, which can only be gathered from various articles and letters in the newspapers, and articles in magazines. But your paper gives me the assurance that I miss nothing which could be of use to me in the train of thought upon which I may just be engaged,
and seldom does a weekly issue of PUBLIC OPINION appear from which I cannot cull some useful suggestion. As a lecturer on art, I need all the suggestions on life that I can get into my hands, for I treat art in all its phases popularly.
From PUBLIC OPINION I get to know certain modern authors with whose methods of thinking I am in sympathy, and those I follow up further. Your paper does me the service to point to them.

Your selection of current thought is worthy of all praise, for it gives one the wholesome feeling that the world is after all not going to the devil, but contains thinkers and good men and women.

I wish you with all my heart continuous success with your paper.

Yours very truly,
(Sgd.) HUBERT VON HERKOMER.

PUBLIC OPINION.

A Weekly Review of Current Thought and Activity.
EVERY FRIDAY. TWOPENCE.

Edited by PERCY L. PARKER.

The purpose of PUBLIC OPINION is to provide information by means of a weekly review of current thought and activity as they are expressed in the world's newspapers, magazines and books, and to put on record the ideas and activities which make for religious, political and social progress.

PUBLIC OPINION can be obtained from any Newsagent or Bookstall, or will be sent post free for one year to any address in the United Kingdom for 10s. 10d.; and to any place abroad for 13s.
per annum. Orders should be addressed to—

PUBLIC OPINION,

30 & 31, Temple House, Tallis St., London, E.C.

Specimens free on application.

PERCY L. PARKER.

THE INDEX TO VOLUME I. OF THE NATION

Is NOW READY, and can be had free on application to the Manager.

MODERN EGYPT

BY THE

EARL OF CROMER.

With Portrait of Author and Map.
2 Vols. 8vo, 24s. net.

THE LETTERS OF MARTIN LUTHER.

Selected and Translated by MARGARET A.
CURRIE. 8vo, 12s. net.

 The first collection in English of the Letters of the great Reformer.

A NEW BOOK ON BUDDHISM.

THE INWARD LIGHT.

By H. FIELDING HALL, Author of "The Soul of a People," &c. Second Impression. 8vo,
10s. net.

THE PRIMADONNA. A SEQUEL TO "SOPRANO."

By F. MARION CRAWFORD. Extra Crown
8vo, 6s.

CONFESSIO MEDICI.

By the Writer of "The Young People." 3s. 6d.
net.

 A volume of essays, full of warm-hearted kindness and quick humour, that appeal to all who take an interest in suffering humanity.

TYPES OF TRAGIC DRAMA.

By C. E. VAUGHAN, M.A., Professor of English Literature in the University of Leeds.
Extra Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

 A work which traces the growth of the drama from Aeschylus to Ibsen.

ESSAYS IN MUNICIPAL ADMINISTRATION.

By Professor JOHN A. FAIRLIE, Ph.D. 8vo,
10s. 6d. net.

PRIMITIVE SECRET SOCIETIES.

A Study in Early Politics and Religion. By Professor HUTTON WEBSTER, Ph.D. Extra
Crown 8vo, 8s. 6d. net.

MACMILLAN & CO., LTD., LONDON.

"A Superb Paradox."

The Man Who Was Thursday. Price 6s. A Nightmare. By G. K. Chesterton.

The Observer.—"It is not a satire; it is not philosophy; it is not wholly serious, neither is it wholly flippant; it is not exactly a novel, a homeletic, a philosophy, or even a book; it is an atmosphere, an intellectual impression. It is 'awfully' droll, witty, racy, vivacious, paradoxical, humorous, pithy, and what not else. . . . Mr. Chesterton has done an admirable thing, and probably knows it."

Daily Telegraph.—"The title of Mr. G. K. Chesterton's new story reminds us of the anecdote of an intoxicated man who stopped a policeman in the West End and asked, 'Can you tell me if this is Regent Street—or Wednesday?' . . . He has devised one of the maddest stories ever written —a story beside the incidents of which the events of Stevenson's 'New Arabian Nights' are mere matters of everyday occurrence, a story the successive episodes of which, while they raise our laughter, make us wonder what the next chapter can have to reveal as entertaining as the one before."

Glasgow Herald.—"We know of no modern writer who combines fancy and humour so exquisitely as Mr. Chesterton, nor of any book of his in which these qualities are so evident as in the one before us."

Bristol: J. W. ARROWSMITH. London: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL & CO.

BOOK BARGAINS.—Harmsworth's Encyclopædia, last edition 10 vols.,
25/-, cost £2 16s. net. Who's Who, 1907, 4/6, cost 11/- net. Burton's Arabian Nights, full edition, illustrated, 17 vols., £13 13s. Lear's Book of Nonsense,
2/6, pub. 6/. Balzac's Famous Novels in English, 40 vols., £3 3s. Oscar Wilde's Dorian Gray, 10/6. Pepys's Diary, 4 vols., 15/-, pub. £1 10s. G. P. R.
James's Historical Novels, 25 vols., £2 2s. Encyclopædia Britannica, last edition, 35 vols., £12 12s. Business Cyclopædia and Legal Adviser, 6 vols., £1 4s., cost £2 8s. Catalogues free. Books bought. Special list of 3,000 books wanted post free. Libraries purchased for cash. —HOLLAND BROS., Book Merchants, 21, John Bright St., Birmingham.
[Books out of print supplied. Please state wants.]

of the working classes have sprung many notable leaders, but, for personal character, insight, sound judgment, and patient continuance in well-doing, none stand higher than Thomas Burt." We should be inclined to add that Parliament to-day contains no speaker possessing equal powers of style—that is to say, of suggesting character and a point of view, through the medium of skilfully chosen words.

* * *

UNDER the comprehensive title, "The Story of Crime: From the Cradle to the Grave" (Werner Laurie, 12s. 6d. net), Mr. H. L. Adam deals in rather sketchy fashion with some of the problems of criminology, and describes the condition of the chief prisons in this country. Although the book will not interest those who have given any serious attention to prison reform, it may be commended to those who require a popular account of the subject. In his opening chapter, Mr. Adam discusses the small crimes, which often form the first step in the career of the habitual criminal, and suggests that the dexterity shown by young children in picking pockets is due to the Fagins who still exist among the criminal classes. Then follow chapters on the police, solicitors, advocates, judges, the police-courts, the prisons, and various types of criminals, such as poisoners, burglars, coiners, forgers, and blackmailers. Mr. Adam passes several criticisms upon the police, and maintains that to deny the existence of blackmailing on the part of police-constables is "sheer, fatuous nonsense." Of the prisons, he has most praise for Wormwood Scrubbs, and is most severe on Wandsworth. He commends the Borstal system, and has a high opinion of the humanitarian methods which were initiated at Bedford by Mr. Western, and have now been in force at Borstal for about five years, with the result that 50 per cent. of the inmates have not returned to criminal lives. The system of solitary confinement is rightly condemned, and Mr. Adam does not exaggerate when he says that "the folly of confining a smarting, rebellious wrongdoer in a small cell for twelve out of every twenty-four hours is positively incredible." It leads to reckless efforts to escape, often accompanied by attacks on warders. We have noticed one or two trifling mistakes—nos prosequi on page 69 is probably a misprint—but Mr. Adam seems to have studied his subject at first-hand. An interesting feature is the number of excellent photographs by which the book is illustrated.

* * *

MESSRS. DENT are to be congratulated on the progress which their "Everyman's Library" Series is making. The scheme of forming a collection of a thousand volumes, in which all the notable books in the language will be accessible at the price of a shilling a volume, is a huge undertaking, but the skill shown in selecting the three hundred and fifteen volumes already issued, and the delightful form in which they have been printed and produced should go far to ensure the success of the project. One feature of the series is especially worthy of praise. The delicate art of literary criticism runs no small risk of perishing from amongst us owing to the failure which so commonly attends a volume of essays about books, however great its merits. Each of the books in "Everyman's Library" has an introduction, and some of these introductions are models of what a literary appreciation should be. Not the least merit of the series is that in this way it does something to promote an interest in the careful and considered appraisement of an author's qualities—an art which we are lamentably inferior to our French neighbours. The fifty volumes just added to the series include several of great interest. Parkman's "History of the Conspiracy of Pontiac" is only known to a small circle of readers in this country, and Mr. Thomas Seecombe has done real service in introducing it to a larger public. The book only needs to be known in order to become popular. Written as Parkman says in his preface "to portray the American forest and the American Indian at the period when both received their final doom," it is by far the best account we have of what Mr. Seecombe aptly calls "the sad unfading record of the decline and fall of the American Indians, of the prairie-roaming bison, of the coureurs de bois, and of the huge lacustrine or pine-clad solitudes of the American forest." It is written in a style full of vivid colouring, and with all the animation and sympathy of a man who loved his subject.

THE aim of Mr. Burrell's edition of Chaucer's "Canterbury Tales" is, by modernising the spelling and by substituting equivalents for the archaic words, to make Chaucer intelligible to those who have not patience enough to master the early English in which he wrote. This is a daring and a difficult task, but Mr. Burrell has done well. Pedants, of course, will complain that Mr. Burrell's substitutions have less force than the words which Chaucer actually wrote, and do not always give the exact shade of meaning he intended. But the book need not be read by pedants. The changes made are only those which put the ordinary reader in a position to understand Chaucer without having to call in the help of a glossary, and for dozens of lines at a time there is scarcely any change made. Should the work succeed in making one of the greatest humorists who ever wrote English verse more widely read, Mr. Burrell's work will be of the highest value. In any case, he has performed a most interesting and hopeful experiment.

* * *

IN his introduction to Carlyle's work on Cromwell, Dr. W. A. Shaw has some very hard things to say about Puritanism. Carlyle, he says, committed the double error of misconceiving the essential spirit of Puritanism, and misconceiving the real nature of the constitutional problem of the seventeenth century. Puritanism had neither a moral mission nor a missionary spirit. "In misrepresenting the true nature of English seventeenth-century Puritanism Carlyle has done a dis-service of the most malignant import to the cause of history; and in representing Cromwell himself as the exponent and outcome of such Puritanism rather than as its opponent, Carlyle has done an equal dis-service to Cromwell's own memory." This extreme view will find little endorsement, and when Dr. Shaw goes on to describe the Reformation as a movement of reaction, which bound the human mind and rivetted the chains of feudalism and priestcraft, he is merely perverse. When full allowance has been made for the narrowness of the Puritan spirit, and even for its strain of intolerance, the fact must remain undisputed that it was Puritanism which largely moulded the men of rugged independence who won for us a great share of our present freedom. It survives in the strongest types of modern Englishmen, and, indeed, it is hard to conceive English society to-day without continual reference to it.

* * *

OTHER volumes of interest are Cary's translation of Dante's "Divine Comedy," which has been edited with an introduction and short but useful notes by Mr. Edmund G. Gardner; "The Travels of Marco Polo," with an introduction by Mr. John Manfield; Balzac's "Quest of the Absolute" and "The Chouans," each with a brief introduction by Professor Saintsbury; and several volumes of Dickens with introductions by Mr. G. K. Chesterton.

* * *

OF the twelve churches whose stores of plate are described in "Church Plate of the City of Chester" (Sheratt & Hughes, 10s. 6d. net), those of Holy Trinity, St. Michael's and Olave's, and St. Mary Without the Walls, must be deemed especially fortunate in that each one of them possesses an Elizabethan cup or chalice. At the first-named there is also a paten of the same period, and at St. Mary Without the Walls a paten cover. While the date of the cups is approximately 1570, they are really survivals from pre-Reformation times. They were adapted by re-hammering from the older vessels; in shape they are virtually the same as those in use a century earlier. The main difference between this pre-Reformation form of bowl and the later one is that the former is less spherical; and, as Mr. T. Stanley Ball, the author of this work points out, the obvious inconvenience to communicants, called upon to drink from the more modern cups, with their great depth and contracted form of lip, has influenced a return to the earlier style of chalice not less than has the recognition of the latter's superior beauty. Mr. Ball's researches among inventories have been systematic and thorough, and a chronological table of the plate, from 1570 to 1903, together with an excellent index, makes his volume most valuable for purposes of reference. The illustrations are beautifully produced on art paper.

* * *

By the latter half of the 18th century Spanish art was as decadent as Spanish politics were disastrous. Vitality

Scribner's March 1908. Magazine

THE TRAIL OF THE LONESOME PINE,

by John Fox, Jr., author of "The Little Shepherd of Kingdom Come." A strong Serial which commenced in the January number.

Chateau and Country Life in France, by Madame Waddington, author of the "Letters of a Diplomat's Wife."

The West in the Orient, by Charles M. Pepper, U.S. Foreign Trade Commissioner. The Transformation of Transportation. Illustrated.

Across the Cordilleras, by Arthur Ruhl. Illustrated. An account of an adventurous and dangerous winter journey over the great Andean Range.

The Art of Millet, by Kenyon Cox. Illustrated. A most interesting and sympathetic study of the personality of the artist and his place in modern art.

SHORT STORIES:

The General Manager, by Robert Herrick.

The Candle Flame, by Virginia Tracy.

Hinkson's Double Life, by Francis Cotton.

For this Relief much Thanks, by Francis Lynde.

On Sale Everywhere. ONE SHILLING.

CHARLES SCRIBNER'S SONS,
TEMPLE HOUSE, TALLIS STREET, LONDON. E.C.

SATURDAY CARTOONS BY "F.C.G." SHORT STORIES, BOOK REVIEWS, LITERARY ARTICLES, PROBLEMS AND PRIZES, SURVEY OF THE WEEK, BRIDGE, CHESS, PHOTO- GRAPHY. NATURE AND SCIENCE, Etc., Etc. (One Penny Weekly.) WESTMINSTER

THE BOOK MONTHLY

NOW ON SALE.

The March "BOOK MONTHLY," 6d. net, beautifully illustrated, having bright literary gossip, informed special articles, and full information of the books just published and about to be published.

If you are interested in books, you should get this dainty magazine regularly; and certainly you should write for a specimen copy to the Publishers, SIMPKIN MARSHALL & CO., Stationers' Hall Court, London who will send one free.

LENT TERM NUMBER READY NEXT WEEK

2s. 6d. NET.

Containing Articles by G. K. CHESTERTON, Hon. and Rev. JAMES ADDERLEY, R. J. MACKENZIE, S. E. WINBOLT, and many others.

THE OXFORD AND CAMBRIDGE REVIEW

Appearing thrice yearly—to correspond with the Academic terms—this review has for its object the presentation by the most competent observers of various administrative and educational problems which to-day confront Oxford and Cambridge. It will also endeavour to represent the characteristic energies whether in thought, research, or action, of the two Universities.

The Lent Term Number will contain, among others, the following articles:—

Human Nature and the Historians

G. K. CHESTERTON

Amateur Acting at Oxford and Elsewhere

The REV. and HON. JAMES
ADDERLEY, Founder of the Society.

The Curse of Tongues

R. J. MACKENZIE

The Value of Greek Accents

S. E. WINBOLT

The Tendency in Modern Poetry

FRANCIS L. BICKLEY

Large v. Small Colleges in America

H. W. HORWILL

The Oxford Man

M. F. J. McDONNELL

The Cambridge Man

LUCIAN OLDERSHAW

The Universities and the Public Schools

J. L. STOCKS

Matriculations at Oxford and Cambridge, 1544-1906

J. A. VENN

 A few copies of No. I., Midsummer Term 1907, and No. II., Michaelmas Term 1907, remain for sale. Price 2/6 net.

The OUTLOOK says:

"A remarkable illustration of the new development of University thought. The themes, if we may judge by the first number, are likely to be of much more than academic interest. . . . Seldom has a new magazine had a finer introduction to cultivated, and, indeed, democratic audiences."

Please write for detailed Prospectus and List of Contents to A. Constable & Co., Ltd., 10, Orange St., W.C. London.

NEW WORLDS FOR OLD

6/-

BY

6/-

H. G. WELLS.

Daily News:—"Mr. Wells puts his case in a sane, practical manner which should show the opponents of Socialism that they are not dealing with dreamers or fanatics, but have a reasoned view of society which they must confront with reason and with an alternative."

NEW 6/- NOVELS.

THE ANCIENT LAW

... ELLEN GLASGOW,
Author of "The Deliverance."

A COMEDY OF MOODS

GREVILLE H. TEMPANY,
A Humorous Story by a New Writer.

THE DAUGHTER ...

... CONSTANCE SMEDLEY,
Author of "Conflict."

THE BURNING CRESSET

HOWARD PEASE,
Author of "Magnus Sinclair."

LONDON: A. CONSTABLE & Co., LTD.

had left it. Painting had resolved itself into a dull eclecticism, practised by second-hand Velasquezes and Murillos. Into this ocean of hopeless mediocrity suddenly came Goya, one of the greatest artistic geniuses, certainly the most independent, that Spain has ever produced. Mr. A. F. Calvert has satisfied a want by including an account of this artist in the Spanish Series (John Lane, 3s. 6d. net). With the exception of Mr. W. Rothenstein's monograph in the "Artists' Library," which is now out of print, and one by Professor Muther in the Langham series, no complete biography of him exists in our language, and both these volumes are too short to be wholly comprehensive. Mr. Calvert's is short also; but he has profited by his predecessor's researches and has produced a fairly satisfactory survey of his subject. Goya stood apart from the contemporary school of his country as emphatically as Rembrandt from his fellow-Dutchmen. He owed little to his forerunners, and prided himself on owing less. He painted and drew to please himself in accordance with a fancy that was as tempestuous and variable as his character. Portraits, church paintings, satires as biting as Hogarth's, and even more grotesque, all show the originality and complete independence of his mind. A generous gallery of his works is presented by the illustrations to this volume, which number over six hundred, and include examples of every phase of his activity.

* * *

THE re-issue of Dr. Burckhardt's "The Cicerone: An Art Guide to Painting in Italy" (Werner Laurie, 6s. net) is something of an event. It is a quarter of a century since the last English edition of the work was published, and though in the interval the often excellent instruction contained in Baedeker has sufficed for most of the travellers, and even the students in Italy, the reputation of the "Cicerone" has easily survived the lapse of time. Apart from that, the present edition has features commendable enough to make it popular. It is illustrated with half-tone blocks on art paper. What is more important, perhaps, is that the indices of places and painters has been compiled with the fulness and care that give half the value to a work of reference. As Mr. P. G. Konody points out in the preface, which he contributes, a good deal has happened in the world of aesthetic criticism during the last twenty-five years, and since Morelli the game of attribution has become an exceedingly complex affair. It is, therefore, all the more surprising that Burckhardt's criticism reads as fresh and as sound as it does in the light of recent utterances, and that his attributions are not more often astray. Mrs. A. H. Clough is responsible for the translation from the German text.

The Week in the City.

THE Board of Trade returns for February are remarkably good. Although new orders have fallen off, the old orders have been sufficient to keep the level nearly up to last year's, in spite of the depression in America, Egypt, and Japan. This means, with lower prices for raw materials, that the profits of manufacturers must be very high in some trades, as many of the contracts were entered into months ago, at the height of the boom. Nevertheless, there can be no doubt that the high rate of taxation, and the after-effects of the severe crisis, have hit a good many concerns in various branches of trade. I hear of failures and difficulties in the Sheffield cutlery and silver-plate trade, in the shoe trade at Leeds, and, of course, in the wool trade, where many speculative persons are suffering for purchases rashly made last autumn in Australia. Shipping difficulties are also prominent this week, and the Chilean crisis has caused another failure. Probably the prevalent belief that trade is declining explains the weakness of the home railway market, though this has been accentuated by the Great Northern and Great Central fiasco, and by fear that the Miners' Eight Hours Bill will send up the price of coal.

BREWERY SHARES.

There have been one or two smart rallies in certain brewery stocks in the last few days. It was quite worth the trade's while to spend a few thousand pounds in agitation. The outcry has been so much overdone that a reaction was bound to set in, and there have been smart rallies in certain stocks; but I should advise investors to be very careful to keep quite clear of the companies that have speculated wildly in tied houses. Time-limit or no time-limit, many of these purchases were made at extravagant prices, in the frantic desire to get the means of forcing bad beer on the local public. The stockbrokers' protest was got up, I hear, by a gentleman who has been jobbing in brewery shares. Many respectable firms signed, largely for political reasons. But outside the Stock Exchange and interested parties, there is no particular indignation against the Bill. There is a feeling that some of the provisions are very stiff, and that some others are foolish, and certain to provoke popular resentment. One or two of the largest and most important firms of brokers in the City refused to sign the protest, thinking, probably, that it was a little bit undignified, and also that it offended against the rule which prohibits advertising.

AMERICAN RAILWAYS.

Reports from New York about American railways and about the commercial situation are rather less dismal, though receiverships and failures are still the fashion. However, the Knickerbocker Trust resumption has come sooner than was expected; the steel trade is recovering a little, and the railways are reducing their operating expenses. Opinion in Wall Street seems to be that the worst is now over, but that no big recovery can be expected unless and until a good harvest is assured. The United States ought (if the theories of Tariff Reformers were accurate) to be very happy; for it is exporting enormously—copper, flour, cotton, emigrants, &c., and importing on a phenomenally small scale. This cannot go on indefinitely, even where half or more of the mills and furnaces are shut down. After several months of curtailment, stocks must be running low, and the volume of importation must soon swell. Then I expect gold will return to Europe, and perhaps there may be a little fillip given to our manufacturers. The question for investors is whether this is not the time to pick up American stocks cheap. I am inclined to think so, especially if the sum to be invested can be spread over a number of stocks. In the case of railroads, where receiverships are at all possible, ordinary stocks should be shunned, in order to avoid an assessment.

THE RAND GOLD MINES.

Whatever may be thought of the continued depreciation of shares on the Rand (which have never recovered from the Boer War), it must be admitted that the gold output of the Transvaal is extraordinary. It seems to have been stimulated by the advent of General Botha's Ministry and by the repatriation of the Chinese. With two less days February's total output was 541,930 oz., only 18,399 oz. less than January's, and £205,000 above that of last February, whereas January was only £100,000 better than January of last year. Over 3,000 Chinese coolies were repatriated during the month, but the supply of natives rose by 7,641. As compared with last year, the natives employed have increased by 38,000, and the Chinese have decreased by 25,000. From the native figures, however, 10,000 should be deducted owing to the recent inclusion of the Robinson Mines in the return. The new legislation which is being proposed by the Transvaal Government is intended to encourage white labour, to increase the number of claims worked, and to enlarge the Government's revenue. It is regarded with some apprehension in the Kaffir market.

NEW ISSUES.

Last week's reduction in the Bank Rate and this week's strong Bank Return are provoking prospectuses and new issues on a scale that is quite alarming to the Stock Exchange, which fears further depreciation of existing stocks. The Grand Trunk Railway is a great offender. There seems to be no limit to the amount of capital which it is willing to put in front of the Ordinary and Preference stocks. One of the comic tragedies of the week was the San Salvador loan, of which 96 per cent. was left with the underwriters. It was selling on Thursday at 6 or 7 per cent. discount—below what the underwriters had given for it.

LUCELLUM.

"Beautifully Cool and Sweet Smoking."

Player's

Navy Cut

Tobacco and Cigarettes

Sold only in the original
Packets and Tins, and may be obtained from all Stores and Tobacconists of repute

O487.

Nervous Disorders

A deficiency of the phosphates causes a lowering of nervous tone, indicated by exhaustion, restlessness, headache or insomnia.

Horsford's Acid Phosphate

(Non-Alcoholic)

supplies the nerve cells with health-giving life force, restores strength and induces restful sleep without the use of dangerous drugs.

An Ideal Tonic in Nervous Diseases

If your chemist does not have it in stock he can obtain it from Bovril, Ltd., 152 Old Street, London, E. C.

BIRKBECK BANK

ESTABLISHED 1851.

SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, HIGH HOLBORN, W.C.

2½ per cent. INTEREST allowed on Deposit Accounts.

2 per cent. INTEREST

on Drawing Accounts with Cheque Book.
All General Banking Business transacted.
ALMANACK, with full particulars, POST FREE.

C. F. RAVENSCROFT, Secretary.

Get this into your Mind
"BOVRIL IS ALL BEEF"

TANGYE OIL ENGINE

AUTOMATIC
TUBE IGNITION.

NO LAMP
EXCEPT FOR STARTING

TANGYES LTD
BIRMINGHAM.

CONNOISSEURS OF COFFEE DRINK THE

RED WHITE & BLUE

Delicious for Breakfast & after Dinner.

In making, use LESS QUANTITY, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

For everyday and everybody.

Rowntree's
ELECT COCOA

The Economist.

(ESTABLISHED 1843.)

Weekly Commercial Times, Bankers' Gazette, and Railway Monitor.

A POLITICAL, LITERARY, FINANCIAL AND GENERAL NEWSPAPER.
PRICE 8d. By Post, 9d. ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION FOR THE UNITED KINGDOM, £2.
COLONIES AND ABROAD, £2 4s.

The established authority on all Financial and Commercial subjects. In addition to a large high-class general circulation, the ECONOMIST is subscribed to by Banking Houses, Chambers of Commerce, Mercantile Firms, and Railway, Insurance, and other Companies throughout the United Kingdom, the Colonies and Abroad; and, as its columns from week to week show, it is the recognised organ for the announcements of some of the most important trades in the Kingdom.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY IN TIME FOR THE MORNING MAIL.

Offices: GRANVILLE HOUSE, ARUNDEL STREET, STRAND, W.C., and of all Booksellers and Newsagents.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

OPPOSITE THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

THACKERAY HOTEL

Great Russell Street, London.

NEAR THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

KINGSLEY HOTEL

Hart Street, Bloomsbury Square, London.

Passenger Lifts, Electric Light throughout,
Bathrooms on every Floor,
Spacious Dining, Drawing, Writing, Reading, Billiard
and Smoking Rooms. Heated throughout.

Fireproof Floors, Perfect Sanitation. Telephones. Night Porters.

BEDROOMS (including attendance) from 3/6 to 6/0.Inclusive Charge for Bedroom, Attendance, Table d'Hôte,
Breakfast and Dinner, from 8/6 to 10/6 per day.

FULL TARIFF AND TESTIMONIALS ON APPLICATION.

Telegraphic Addresses { Thackeray Hotel—"Thackeray, London."
Kingsley Hotel—"Bookcraft, London."

FOREIGN HOTELS.

WIESBADEN.HOTEL NASSAU. With fine Bathing Establishment. Situated at the Curplace. "The English Home."ST. MORITZ, ENGADINE.*THE BELVEDERE. High-class English Family Hotel, in the finest and sunniest position. Inclusive terms 11 to 20 francs.London & County Banking Company, Limited

REGISTERED UNDER "THE COMPANIES ACTS."

ESTABLISHED IN 1838.

CAPITAL - £8,000,000, in 100,000 Shares of £80 each.
Paid-up Capital, £2,000,000. Reserve Fund, £1,550,000.Directors.

JOHN ANNAN BRYCE, Esq., M.P.
JOHN JAMES CATER, Esq.
ERNEST H. CUNARD, Esq.
VISCOUNT GOSCHEN.
C. SEYMOUR GRENFELL, Esq.
CHARLES JOHN HEGAN, Esq.
WILLIAM E. HUBBARD, Esq.

SIR THOMAS JACKSON, BART.
WM. MCKEWAN, Esq. (Honorary Director).
OSWALD CECIL MAGNIAC, Esq.
WILLIAM G. RATHBONE, Esq.
CHARLES J. CATER SCOTT, Esq.

Auditors.

HENRY GRANT, Esq. THOMAS HORWOOD, Esq.
Hon. STUART PLEYDELL-BOUVIERIE.
Head Office Manager—HERMAN RICHARD WYATT.
Deputy Head Office Manager—FREDERICK JAMES BARTHOPE.
Country Manager—WILLIAM GEORGE GRIBBLE.
Chief Inspector—FRANK WILLIAM HOWETT.
Chief Accountant—THEOPHILUS JAMES CARPENTER.
Secretary—EDGAR FRANCIS ROBINSON.

Head Office: 21, LOMBARD STREET, E.C.THE LONDON AND COUNTY BANKING COMPANY, LIMITED.Opens DRAWING ACCOUNTS with Commercial Houses and Private Individuals, upon the plan usually adopted by Bankers.DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS.—Deposit Receipts are issued for sums of Money placed upon these Accounts, and Interest is allowed at such rates as advertised, reference being had to the state of the Money Market.CIRCULAR NOTES AND LETTERS OF CREDIT are issued payable in the principal Cities and Towns of the Continent. Letters of Credit are also issued payable in Australia, Canada, India, China, the United States, and elsewhere.The Agency of Foreign and Country Banks is undertaken.
The Purchase and Sale of Government and other Stocks, also of English and Foreign Shares, are effected. Dividends, Annuities, &c., are received for Customers of the Bank.Great facilities are afforded to the Customers of the Bank for the receipt of Money both from and in the Towns where the Company has Branches.The following Banks will receive and transmit, free of charge, credits for customers of this Bank:—Barclay and Co., Ltd.; Capital and Counties Bank, Ltd.; Lloyds Bank, Ltd.; London City and Midland Bank, Ltd.; and National Provincial Bank of England, Ltd.The Officers of the Bank are bound not to disclose the transactions of any of its Customers.By Order of the Directors, E. F. ROBINSON, Secretary.TYPEWRITING.*TYPEWRITING.—Typewriting of every description, high-class work. Author's MSS. 10d. per thousand words, prompt, accurate. E. C. PEARCE, 30, College Road, Reading.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

LONDON.WILD'S TEMPERANCE HOTELS. J. B. Wild, C.C., Man. Direc.
30-40, Ludgate Hill, E.C.; 70 & 71, Euston Square, W.C.AT BOURNEMOUTH HYDRO.

IDEAL RESIDENCE.

Sun Lounge. Every form of Bath.

BOURNEMOUTH.THE QUEEN, Bath Road. Miss Tye.
Central. Board and Residence, 35/6 to 3 guineas weekly.NEWLYN'S (Royal Exeter) HOTEL. Close Pier; 1st Class; Moderate.SILVER HOW. Boarding Est. West Cliff Gdns. From 30s. week.BRIDPORT (Near West Bay), DORSET.*BOARD RESIDENCE. Every Comfort. 10, West St., Bridport.BRIGHTON.*THE HOTEL METROPOLE. E. Richard, Manager.ROYAL YORK HOTEL. H. J. Preston.BUXTON.*ST. ANN'S HOTEL. First Hotel.DARTMOOR—YELVERTON.*THE TORS HOTEL. Tel.: 0199. Mrs. F. Sara.BARON'S TEMPERANCE HOTEL. Magnificent Moor Views.DEAL*BEACH HOUSE HOTEL. S. R. Jefferson.EASTBOURNE.*CLARENCE Private Hotel & Boarding House, Sussex Grdns. 5/- day.HADDON HALL, Devonshire Place, overlooking Sea. 5/- day.EXETER.*DELLERS CAFE. Cathedral Close, and at Paignton.GREAT YELDHAM—ESSEX.*THE WHITE HART HOTEL. Proprietor, W. Pearl.HENLEY-ON-THAMES.*RED LION HOTEL. Overlooking famous Regatta course.ILFRACOMBE.*COLLINGWOOD PRIVATE HOTEL. 120 Rooms. Facing Sea.LEEDS.*HOTEL METROPOLE, 2 minutes' walk from either station.LIVERPOOL*COMPTON HOTEL, Church Street. Wm. Russell.

Telegrams: "Compton." Telephone: 3032 Royal, 3 wires.

LLANELLY.CLEVELAND HOTEL. J. T. Weaver.MALDON.*TEMPERANCE HOTEL, Market Hill. C. Simons, Manager.MALVERN.*HARDWICKE PRIVATE HOTEL. Prop. & M'g'r.—J. Wilson.MANCHESTER.*THE PRINCES CAFE. Oxford Street.THE DEANS GATE HOTEL. Deansgate.MATLOCK.*SMEDLEY'S Hydropathic Establishment. Estab. 1853. H. Challand, Mng'r.ROCKSIDE HYDRO. Tennis, Bowls, &c. Nr. Golf Links. (18 holes).OXFORD (near).*SUNNINGWELL HALL, Boars Hill. Dry, Sunny, Golf, etc. LecturePENTRE.*PENTRE HOTEL, Rhondda. Tel. No. P.O. 30. W. H. Miles.PLYMOUTH.*GOODBODY'S CAFES. And at Torquay.SWISS CAFE, Union Street. Moderate. Genoni Bros.PORTSMOUTH.*SPEEDWELL HOTEL. A. Grigsby, Managing Director.SOUTHSEA.*STRATHEARN MANSIONS, South Parade. Miss Collis, Manageress.ST. MORITZ, ENGADINE.BELVEDERE, high-class English Family Hotel. Situated in sunniest and finest position. Inclusive terms 11 to 20 francs.SWANAGE."CRAIGSIDE," Board Residence. Tel.: 6. Misses Fell.TEIGNMOUTH.*REGENT RESTAURANT & Criterion Hall for Catering. W. H. Bonner.WHITBY.*WEST CLIFF PRIVATE HOTEL. Mrs. T. Newbitt.WOODFORD GREEN, ESSEX.*WILFRED LAWSON. Temp. Hotel, J. J. Blundell Manager.

EDUCATIONAL.

BOOTHAM SCHOOL, YORK.

(Under the Management of the Society of Friends.)

Twenty-six boys passed University Entrance Examinations in 1906 and 1907.

A new feature for post-Matriculation students is a CITIZENSHIP COURSE, including Economics and Modern History with special reference to existing political institutions and social problems.

The School continues to hold a strong position in Leisure-Hour work:—Natural History, Archaeology, Carpentry, etc.

For copies of prospectus and full particulars with regard to scholarships, apply to the Head Master, Bootham School, York.

Head Master: *Arthur Rowntree, Certificate of Distinction in the Theory, History, and Practice of Education, Cantab.THE HINDHEAD SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Principal: Miss J. F. GRUNER, Certificated Student of Girton College, late Second Mistress, Dulwich High School, G.P.D.S.Co. Education thoroughly modern; physical training and outdoor games. Great attention is paid to healthful conditions of life. The boarding-house stands at an elevation of 800 ft.—For prospectus address to BRACKENHURST, HINDHEAD, HASLEMERE, R.S.O.

THE LEYS SCHOOL, CAMBRIDGE.

ENTRANCE SCHOLARSHIPS IN MARCH.

Preparatory School at Hitchin recognised by the Governors. Enquiries should be addressed to the BURSAR.

INFORMATION AND ADVICE AS TO SCHOOLS.

THE SCHOLASTIC, CLERICAL, AND MEDICAL ASSOCIATION, LTD. (a body of Oxford and Cambridge graduates), gives advice and assistance without charge to Parents and Guardians in the selection of schools (for GIRLS AND BOYS) at home or abroad, and as to Tutors (ARMY, NAVY, UNIVERSITY, &c.). A statement of the requirements should be sent to the Manager.

B. J. BEEVOR, M.A., 22, Craven Street, Trafalgar Square, W.C.
Telegrams: "TRIFORM. LONDON." Telephone No. 1854 GERRARDSEASIDE SCHOOLS FOR GIRLS.*BROADWATER HALL, WORTHING.

Good English Education. Eight Acres of Grounds.

LE PLEIN AIR, DIEPPE.Languages, Accomplishments, Needlework, Cookery.
Principals—THE MISSES TRITTON.AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE, TAMWORTH.

YOUTHS TRAINED FOR HOME OR COLONIES.

Farm, 1,000 acres. Carpentry, Smith's work. Riding and Shooting taught. Prospectus.

LEIGHTON PARK SCHOOL (Near Reading).

Under the Management of the Society of Friends.

Boys from this PUBLIC SCHOOL have done well at the Universities and in business careers.

The School stands in its own grounds of about 45 acres, high above the town and the Thames Valley.

For Honours List, Prospectus, particulars of Scholarships, and other information, apply to the Head Master, JOHN RIDGES, M.A., at the School.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Curio Club
Bargains

Private persons desirous of disposing of antiques at bargain prices will find a ready sale for same at the "London Opinion Curio Club" 107, Regent Street, London, W.

FERTILISERS for HORTICULTURAL USE.—Write for descriptive price list; carriage paid for 4 cwt. and upwards.—Hy. Richardson & Compy., Manufacturers of Artificial Fertilisers, Skeldergate Bridge, York.THE INDEX TO
VOLUME I. OF THE NATION

Is NOW READY, and can be had free on application to the Manager.

EDUCATIONAL.

WILLASTON SCHOOL, NANTWICH

The next Entrance Examination will be held at the SCHOOL ON MARCH 31st.

For particulars of admission on the Foundation, apply to the Head Master.

RUGBY SCHOOL.THE EXAMINATION FOR SCHOLARSHIPSWill Begin MONDAY, JUNE 1st.

Particulars may be obtained from the Secretary.

BOOKSELLERS.

THE LONDON BIBLE WAREHOUSE

Largest Selection of Other Bibles and Books from 6d. to £10.	Have the I B L E S Oxford and Prayer Books from	Illustrated, Wide Margin, Interleaved, Teachers', Interlinear, Revised, and other Editions.
---	---	---

53, PATERNOSTER ROW, E.C. Telephone Central 329.

BOOKS. Ancient and Modern, Bought, Sold and Exchanged.THOMAS THORP, 100, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.

(And at READING.)

MONTHLY CATALOGUES FREE.

Mr. Thorp has incorporated the business in Review Books carried on for many years by Mrs. Hindley at Booksellers' Row, and at the above address.

UNITARIANISM and THE NEW THEOLOGY.

EXPLANATORY PAMPHLETS SENT POST FREE.

UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION,

ESSEX HALL, ESSEX STREET, STRAND, W.C.

NOTICE.

THE NATION is published weekly. Applications for copies and Subscriptions should be sent to THE NATION Office, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent Garden.

Terms of Subscription, Including Postage:

HOME, 26s. PER ANNUM. FOREIGN, 30s. PER ANNUM.

Cheques should be made payable to THE MANAGER, THE NATION, and crossed "National Provincial Bank."

Telephone No. Gerrard 4035.

Telegrams: "Nationetta," London.

THE NATION may be obtained from the following book-sellers abroad:—

Paris—Galignani's Library, Rue de Rivoli.

Paris—W. H. Smith & Son: Bookshop, 248, Rue de Rivoli.

Nice—Galignani's Library.

Stockholm—Norden and Jephson.

Vienna—Mr. William Frick, Graben 27.

Christiania—The Cammermeyer Boghandel, Carl Johans Gade, 41 and 43.

Melbourne, Sydney, Brisbane, Perth, West Australia—Gordon and Gotch.

Where single Copies can be obtained, and Subscriptions are received.

Scale of Charges for Advertisements.

	FULL PAGE.	$\frac{1}{2}$ PAGE.	$\frac{1}{4}$ PAGE.
Back Page, or Page facing matter ... }	£10 0 0	£5 0 0	£2 10 0
Other Pages ...	8 0 0	4 0 0	2 0 0

Hotels, Hydros, and Educational:

13 Insertions ...	8d. per line.
52	6d. ..

MRS. THURSTON'S
NEW BOOK
THE FLY ON THE WHEEL IS NOW READY
6s.

The Author of "John Chilcote, M.P.," has again proved her right to a great popularity by a story of intense human interest, told with the dramatic skill that has justly made her work famous.

Over 15,000 Copies Sold on day of publication.

CLANBRAE:

A Golfing Idyll.

By PENTLAND PEILE.

"The author's shrewd insight into human nature, and the pawky humour that is so deftly introduced should commend it to many who have not succumbed to the attractions of the game."—Scotsman.

6s.

GILBERT HERMER.

By C. MASEFIELD.

6s.

A MODERN ANTIQUE.

By RICCARDO NOBILI.

"Masterly in style and execution."—Scotsman.

"Exceedingly well written."—Daily Telegraph.

6s.

3rd IMPRESSION

OF

THE . .

GRAIN CARRIERS.

BY

EDWARD NOBLE.

6s.

"His descriptions of the sea are done with a master hand."

—Daily Mail.

"May be described as 'The Jungle' of the sea."—Daily Telegraph.

"A real book from beginning to end."—Times Lit. Supplement.

"An enthralling story."

—Daily Graphic.

"Eloquent, picturesque, dramatic."—Manchester Dispatch.

THE TRANCE.

By Rachael Swete Macnamara.

6s.

INDIA'S SAINT AND THE VICEROY.

By S. S. THORBURN.

"Full of good sense and descriptions: well repays reading."—Times.

6s.

A CURTAIN OF CLOUD

By Major C. SILLERY.

"Worth reading on account of the truth and strength of local colour."—"A delightfully bright and captivating story."—"A Notable Novel."

"Commands attention."—Spectator.

6s.

READY MARCH 23rd.

GARCIA THE CENTENARIAN AND HIS TIMES.
A Musical Memoir.

By M. STIRLING MACKINLAY. 15s. net.

WILLIAM BLACKWOOD and SONS, Edinburgh and London.

"THE NATION," with which is incorporated "The Speaker," printed for the Proprietors by the NATIONAL PRESS AGENCY LIMITED, Whitefriars House, London, E.C., and Published by THE NATION PUBLISHING COMPANY, LIMITED, at the Offices, 14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, London, W.C. Registered at the General Post Office as a Newspaper.—SATURDAY, MARCH 14, 1908.

The Nation

VOL. II., No. 25.]

SATURDAY, MARCH 21, 1908.

[PRICE 6D.
Postage: U.K., ½d. Abroad, 1d.

CONTENTS.

PAGE	PAGE
THE DIARY OF THE WEEK ... 889
POLITICS AND AFFAIRS:—
Drink against Common-wealth ... 892	"Votes for Women and the Liberal Party." By Another Liberal Woman and Another "Woman Liberal" ... 905
The Irish University Bill ... 893	The New Botany. By Ida Sharp ... 906
The Future of the Black Republics ... 894	Are Armaments Necessary? By A. R. ... 906
Wanted—An Unemployment Bill ... 895	Morocco. By Douglas Fox Pitt ... 907
The Eight Hours Day ... 895	"The Rich Man's Dilemma." By F. N. Laycock ... 907
LIFE AND LETTERS:—
The World as a Tune. By Lascelles Abercrombie ... 897	POETRY:—
The Riddle of the Middle Ages ... 898	Ballade of the World in Shadow. By Ethel Talbot ... 907
The Soul of a People ... 899	THE WORLD OF BOOKS ... 908
Modern Daffodils and Narcissi ... 900	Books to be Read ... 908
PRESENT-DAY PROBLEMS:—
Scotland and the Peers. From a Scottish Correspondent ... 901	REVIEWS:—
CONTEMPORARIES:—	A Whited Sepulchre. By Professor A. F. Pollard ... 909
"The Lady-in-Chief" ... 903	A Study in the Half Sincere Critiques for Socialism.—I. Mr. H. G. Wells ... 910
LETTERS TO THE EDITOR:—	From Corot to Sargent ... 911
"The Second Educational Compromise." By L. M. B. ... 904	The Novel of the Week ... 912
The Obstacle to Woman Suffrage. By Christabel Pankhurst ... 904	Books in Brief ... 913
	THE WEEK IN THE CITY ... 916

[The Editor will be pleased to consider manuscripts if accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes. He accepts no responsibility, however, for manuscripts submitted to him.]

Diary of the Week.

THE feeling of the country concerning the Prime Minister's illness has been well illustrated by the personal visits to Downing Street of the Queen and the Prince of Wales. The King has also been kept informed of Sir Henry's condition, and, as to the feeling of politicians, it would be hard to name any public man commanding a more affectionate solicitude.

* * *

THE heads of the Anglican Church have not succumbed to the threats of the brewing trade. On Tuesday, the Council of the Church of England Temperance Society, whose meeting was attended by about twenty Bishops, pledged itself by large majorities to the general principle of the Licensing Bill, to the principle of a time limit subject to the condition of imposing a not "unreasonable strain" on the trade, to the resumption by the State of the monopoly value of licences, and against the re-creation of any vested interest, to the strengthening of the Bill in such matters as the control of clubs and the hours of sale on Sundays. This powerful support is vigorously endorsed by the "Morning Post," the organ of intellectual Toryism, which declares that the trade is practically endeavouring to alter the English law. "Opposition to a time limit," it declares, "regardless of its length, implies a claim to perpetual renewal of annual licences for which there is not even the shadow of justification." The "Post" adds: "The attempt to defeat the principle of a time limit puts those who make it outside the pale of argument." Yet Lord Rothschild, presiding at a meeting of protest at the Cannon Street Hotel, declared even against the supervision of clubs, and hinted at ruin not only for the brewing trade, but for shareholders and policyholders in insurance companies. A practical comment on this extravagance is that of the sale of ordinary shares of Messrs. Bass at Tokenhouse Yard. Eight thousand five hundred and fifty shares were knocked down at prices ranging from 40s. to 42s. per share. These prices, says the "Morning Post," "compare favourably with those of the earlier auctions," in which some lots realised not more than 37s.

* * *

THE sensational reports of an anti-foreign movement in Hayti and of a threatened attack on the Consulates were discounted from the first by the United States authorities, and have clearly been exaggerated. The sole ground of the dispute between the Haytian Government and the foreign legations was the demand of the former for the surrender of some rebels who had taken refuge in the Consulates of Gonaives, St. Marc, and Port de Paix. The trouble began in January with a revolution in the Northern districts designed to depose President Nord Alexis, who has held office since 1902, in favour of Anténor Firmin. The rebels seized Port de Paix, St. Marc, and Gonaives, but were soon blockaded there, and after a severe defeat took refuge at the Consulates. At Port au Prince, the capital, the legations also sheltered fugitives, and in each case the foreign representatives refused to surrender them. An agreement, however, was negotiated to permit them to leave the island, but, for a reason not apparent, the President refused to sanction it, dismissed the foreign Minister, and on Sunday shot a number of prisoners in his hands. The arrival of foreign warships induced the Haytian Government to give way under protest, and they have allowed the refugees to leave the island.

* * *

WE are glad to hear that the organisation of the visit to London next May of a body of German Ministers and University Professors, both Protestant and Catholic, on a mission of international goodwill, promises complete success. The idea, which grew out of a suggestion of Mr. Allen Baker, has been fostered with much warmth in Germany, and has the personal approval of the Kaiser and Prince Bülow. On our side, the Primate, Archbishop Bourne, the Bishop of London, and the leaders of Nonconformity have freely identified themselves with it, and the working committee represents every section of the Churches. The visit of the 140 Priests, Divines, and Professors will be marked by special services on Ascension Day in the Protestant and Catholic Cathedrals—St. Paul's and Westminster—by visits to the historic places of London, to Cambridge University, and to Windsor, by a Mansion House luncheon, and by a series of sermons and a general opening of pulpits in Anglican and Nonconformist Churches. It is, indeed, high time that the religious and civilising forces should bestir themselves to avert the crime of an Anglo-German war. Either these or a half-barbarian instinct of rivalry must prevail.

* * *

THE Unemployed Workmen's Bill, whose character has been fully described in the columns of THE NATION, was defeated on Friday afternoon by 265 votes against 116. The majority was composed of 182 Liberals and 83 Unionists. The minority included 74 Liberals and Labour men. The debate was good-tempered, with fiery intervals, but the line of the supporters of the measure was not quite consistent. Mr. Wilson was willing to jettison Clause 3, with its imposition of standard rates for unemployed workmen, but Mr. Ramsay MacDonald insisted that it was vital to the Bill, and that, without it, the Bill would be, in Mr. Asquith's words, "a mere boneless and bloodless structure." Mr. Burns's speech was able, but his tone far too hard. He himself spoke lightly of criticism of his "tone," but "tone" is a part of statesmanship, which deals not only with measures but with men. Mr. Burns's chief points were that farm colonies were failures, were over-costly and competed with outside labour, and that the imposition of standard rates in the towns would mean that the country lanes would be "black with men" on their way to the high-wage centres. Mr. Asquith's line was more measured. The danger of the Bill was that it implied State control of the whole machinery of production, but he admitted the necessity of State action to supplement individual and communal efforts to deal with unemployment. This was strong ground, but Mr. Asquith also repudiated the principle of the right to work. This, however, is implied both in the Poor-law and in the Unemployed Act of 1905.

* * *

A RESOLUTION favouring the imposition by the State of an eight hours day for all industries, was moved by Mr. Clynes on Wednesday and talked out. The eight hours day is an ideal to which highly organised communities are rapidly tending; as a universal measure imposed by law it is, as Mr. Morley said, a "ramrod" thrust into the industrial machine. Mr. Mond and Mr. Lever, both highly successful employers, favoured an eight hours day for continuous work, but suggested that that maximum must be gradually approached, and that meanwhile the existence of overtime and of workdays of twelve or even fifteen or sixteen hours, endured by busmen, barmaids, and workers in sweated industries, was a bar to its attainment. Mr. Samuel sensibly suggested that the Government, without directly enacting an eight hours day, could contribute to it by indirect action, as through the Factory Acts, or through a model arrangement of State industries. Thus the War Office had established an eight hours day without extra cost to the public and without reducing its output.

* * *

THE two-Power standard has this week been defined and re-defined. On Wednesday Lord Tweedmouth said that instead of taking that standard to mean "the two next strongest Powers abroad (i.e., Germany and the United States) plus ten per cent.," he thought it to be "any reasonable and probable combination" of Powers other than ourselves. He also added, "in a rising voice," that in the spring of 1911 we should have a fleet of first-class battleships superior to a combination of "all the Powers in the world," which certainly sounds cheering. On Thursday, however, Lord Tweedmouth, writing to Lord Cawdor, stated that his "reasonably probable" combination was meant to extend, not to restrict, the definition of the two-Power standard. We confess that this exegesis is beyond us. Does Lord Tweedmouth now contemplate an unreasonably improbable combination?

* * *

MR. DEAKIN, at Sydney, explained his scheme of national defence and the reasons for it. He argued that the extension of foreign settlement in the Pacific—he means, of course, the rise of Japan—has destroyed Australia's isolation, and that she cannot now expect immunity from invasion without paying for it. He wishes the present contribution to the British squadron to be directed to building a local flotilla, and double that amount to be spent yearly on harbour and coast defence. Behind the navy is to be a conscript army. Every Australian citizen between twelve and eighteen years is to get military training in junior or senior cadet corps, and from eighteen to twenty-six to serve in the National Guard. During the first three years in the National Guard he is to be enrolled in a junior regiment, and to train in camp for a total of forty-eight days. He will be then drafted into a senior regiment and receive a pay allowance. Mr. Deakin expects to get an army of 200,000 after eight years, at a cost of £850,000 annually after the first three years. The finance of the scheme, however, is quite obscure, though Mr. Deakin puts the cost of army and navy after three years at under £2,000,000. The Australian Press is almost unanimous against the scheme, but the Labour Party rather favour it, and it may well appeal to that large body of opinion which wants to see Australia a complete, self-dependent nation.

* * *

THE death of General Giorgis, Chief of the Gendarmerie officers in Macedonia, occurred just before the Porte announced the renewal for five years of his mandate, and that of all the other European officials in Macedonia. The renewal is undoubtedly intended to be a spoke in Sir Edward Grey's wheel, but the "Novoe Vremya" denounces it as a comedy, and roundly says the mandate might be renewed for a thousand years without causing any loss to Turkey or gain to Macedonia. The British proposals may receive support from Russia and France and Italy. Prince Bülow says that Germany will leave the initiative to the "more interested" Powers, which may mean anything, and Signor Tittoni insists that the Concert is still very much alive. It is satisfactory, however, to note that the German Press does not condemn Sir Edward Grey's scheme summarily.

* * *

THE third Duma has had its first conflict with the Government, and enforced its point of view. Some months ago the Government announced its intention to rebuild the battleship fleet at a cost of two or three hundred millions sterling. The plan was so bitterly attacked—the consensus of opinion favours small defensive craft—that the hopelessness of persuading the Duma to adopt it was recognised and it was withdrawn, for the present at least. The Duma Committee of National Defence, from which, it will be remembered, the Opposition is entirely excluded, has, however, rejected even a modest credit for battleship construction, until the Navy Department which organised the Tsushima disaster is thoroughly reorganised. M. Stolypin made a vehement appeal for the credit—his speech before the secret Committee has been issued presumably for the benefit of the Duma, which will have to sanction its Committee's report—but he promised to reform the Navy Department and declared he would submit to whatever decision was adopted. Apart from a profound difference of views between the Committee and the Ministry as to Russia's naval need, there was at stake the important constitutional question whether supply should follow or precede reform, and it is satisfactory that even a body entirely composed of reactionaries should have asserted so decisively the authority of the Duma.

* * *

THE Bishop of St. Asaph, who is at once the most astute and the broadest of Conservative Bishops, has re-introduced his Education Bill of 1904. The Bill is a compromise, and it is important to know whether the Anglican Church, as a whole, supports it. It offers a system of universal public schools, in which the teachers would be free, popular control absolute, and "simple Christian teaching" the normal form of religious instruction. On these terms the Church and the Trusts would abandon "contracting out" and surrender their schools. The condition would be the provision of facilities for special instruction on three days a week during school hours on the application of the parents. This is a larger provision for the children of the poor than is thought necessary for the children of the rich, due, we imagine, to the Church's measure of their respective religious needs. But the offer is interesting, and if, as we said, it has serious backing, should not be lightly dismissed.

* * *

LORD HUGH CECIL has addressed a somewhat woe-begone letter to the "Times" on his party position and that of the Unionist Free Traders. He admits that by opposing Liberalism he is throwing Free Trade to the wolves, and that, the Government once destroyed, there remains but a speculative chance of defeating Protection. "It is Radicalism," he says, "that is the chief defender of Free Trade, and Radicalism we have laboured to defeat." In spite of his self-destroying course, he says that the "confederates" are unsatisfied and insist on the total ostracism of Free Trade Unionists. This is true, and we are afraid that Lord Hugh's only hope of return to Parliament would lie through the system of proportional representation. But the idea that the people can stand still, as Lord Hugh would have them do, is merely inhuman, and inevitably condemns him to the isolation he has reached.

* * *

ON Monday the Chinese authorities released the "Tatsu Maru"; the incident has been closed by China undertaking to apologise, to pay the cost of the arms and demurrage, and to punish the local officials who captured the ship. Japan has compelled acceptance of all her terms, and the only concession she makes is a promise to prevent the Japanese traffic in arms with Chinese rebels. The promise is not worth much, because a similar promise has been given before, and Japan refuses to let it extend to Macao, through which port, of course, the lion's share of the nefarious trade goes. Japan refused an offer to refer the dispute to the Hague, but she may have to pay in Chinese ill-will for the success she has gained. The Canton merchants have threatened to organise a boycott of Japanese goods, and this latest episode will help the others to widen the rift between China and Japan.

* * *

MISS FLORENCE NIGHTINGALE was presented on Monday with the freedom of the City of London. The advance of age did not allow her to leave the home in Piccadilly where, since her great achievement in 1854, she has lived in retirement, but in close touch with the work which she has made her own. By her request the illuminated address was enclosed in an oaken instead of a gold casket. The hospital which she established at Scutari exists to-day, but a less perishable monument survives in the great modern science of nursing, whose triumphs exceed even those of surgery and medicine.

* * *

THE "Times" announced on Tuesday that a new Company had been formed to carry on its business, that Mr. Arthur Walter would be Chairman of the Board, and that its three members would be leading members of the staff, including the Editor, with the present Manager, Mr. Moberley Bell, as Managing Director. There would be no change of policy. This announcement veils the identity of the new controlling interest. It has been said, apparently without authority, that this has been secured in the person of Lord Northcliffe. It is earnestly to be hoped that the "Times," having escaped the Scylla of the "Daily Express," will not fall into the Charybdis of the "Daily Mail."

* * *

THE appointment of a lady, Dr. Mary Gordon, as an inspector of prisons, is interesting, and may also prove important. Male inspectors of these establishments, invariably ex-governors of prisons, inspire little confidence. We never look to them for suggestions of reform, and we may confidently expect their opposition. They belong to the Home Office, and are part and parcel of the prison system. Their annual report occupies a try, perfunctory page or so amid the four hundred and odd pages of the Blue-book issued by the Commissioners. It is mere formalism. "We have found that the statutes, rules, and standing orders are properly observed." "The routine as to bathing, hair-cutting, exercise, &c., has been regularly observed." Rules and routine, statutes and standing orders, have been the life of these gentlemen as prison governors; and beyond them they do not look. It will be curious to see whether Dr. Mary Gordon will fall into line. One point strikes us at the outset. In the convict prison for women at Aylesbury the daily average number of prisoners is under 150; but some 50,000 women and girls are passing through prison every year. Is one lady (and it may be noted that Dr. Mary Gordon is already an assistant inspector of State inebriate reformatories) to attend to all? Suffragists recently in prison have protested that women prisoners should have the services of a medical officer of their own sex, and that a woman is badly wanted in the office of sanitary inspector at Holloway. Dr. Mary Gordon, we hope, will find time to examine these complaints.

* * *

THE release of Mrs. Pankhurst from prison was celebrated on Thursday by a demonstration of women Suffragists at the Albert Hall, which was packed. The feature of the assembly was the collection of a campaign fund, based on the Salvationist principles of "self-denial." The self-denial of the Suffragists materialised in a contribution of £7,000, nearly £5,000 of which was raised in the hall. We hope, however, that the Suffragists will not be so unwise as to intervene in the Peckham election against the Liberal candidate. In view of the special issue raised, the junction of women with pot-house campaigners—and such campaigners—would be most unfortunate.

* * *

THE show of camera pictures, by Mr. A. L. Coburn and Baron de Meyer, should attract everyone interested in modern photography to the Goupil Gallery. Both men are well known in the exhibition world, and it was only a short time ago that the gallery of the New English Art Club contained a joint collection of their work. In the clever and artistic handling of gum-bichromate and carbon, there is little to choose between the two, but Baron de Meyer may perhaps be the more finished craftsman and his companion the more inventive. Mr. Coburn's range, indeed, seems illimitable; he can fashion a Japanese landscape and execute a portrait in the spirit of Rembrandt with an equal facility. The still-life studies of Baron de Meyer are perhaps the best part of his achievement. The illusion of texture is complete, and at the same time the photographic quality is kept alive and evident. He exhibits, besides, a number of interesting portraits, including those of King Edward and Queen Alexandra. Mr. Coburn's gallery of celebrities, chosen from the spheres of politics, literature, and art, boasts a portrait of Mr. G. Bernard Shaw, with a pale salmon complexion, which is the only colour print in the exhibition. This is not, however, as great a success as the plain-airist portraits in monotone.

* * *

PERSONALIA.—Lord Dudley has been appointed Governor-General of the Australian Commonwealth in succession to Lord Northcote. We regret Lord Dudley's withdrawal from Irish politics at the moment when he has made so striking a contribution to it, but the nomination is an excellent one. Lord Dudley's amiable and sympathetic temper, his love of the outdoor life, and also his relations to the Irish problem, will ensure him a warm welcome and a steady popularity in Australia.—Sir Nicholas O'Connor, the British Ambassador in Constantinople, died on Thursday. His tenure of our Embassy, both at St. Petersburg and at the Turkish capital, coincided with a depressed and unfortunate phase of our relations with Russia and Turkey, but his countrymen sympathised with his breach with the reactionary and sinister Lobanoff. At Constantinople he had little personal influence, for the star of British diplomacy has declined since the dominance of Germany asserted itself. Sir Nicholas was an honest but not a specially resourceful diplomatist. The appointment of his successor will be a task of great difficulty and importance.

Politics and Affairs.

DRINK AGAINST COMMONWEALTH.

THAT the public-house has always been a chief instrument of electoral corruption, and that during the last twenty years "the trade" has used a growing percentage of the profits bestowed upon it by our reckless public policy in influencing elections and the course of legislation, is matter of common notoriety. But the letter of the Chairman of Meux Brewery to the Committee of the Conservative candidate for Peckham opens a new page of profound significance in the history of "trade politics." The opening passage deserves to be placed on permanent record:—

"I enclose cheque of this company for 50 guineas towards the funds of your Association. In sending you this cheque we are not sending it in our capacity as a brewery company, but as owners of property, the title of which is threatened by confiscatory legislation in the House of Commons, and we are not sending the money to your Association in its capacity as a political association, but because the candidate of your Association, who is seeking election for the constituency of Peckham, is opposed to the principles of the robbery now being advocated in the House of Commons."

This inimitable wording will strike some readers with indignation, some with disgust, others with laughter, each according to his humour. Here are directors of a company making an unauthorised use of its funds, not in the interests of that company, but only in the interests of its property, not subscribing to a political association as such, but only because this association supports a candidate favourable to the maintenance of the Eighth Commandment. What is to be done with such alcoholised reasoning? And yet we are bound to add that this language is representative of the general line of defence which glares upon us from every drink-shop window. Any curious foreign visitor, confined for his reading, as he often is in his hotel, to the pages of the Opposition Press, would come to the conclusion that the first waves of revolutionary Socialism were just breaking in this country upon that industry which for its dignity and truly national importance was designated "the trade," and that the defenders of that trade were taking their stand, not as mere profit-mongers, but as the public-spirited, disinterested champions of those plain principles of morality whose maintenance is essential to the strength and honour of our nation. If any sober-minded person were to explain to him that all this verbosity of moral indignation really meant that our Government, as trustee of the public property in licences, had decided, after a long period of notice, to secure this property in future to the public, instead of giving it away to private companies, his mind would revert to the English literature of his school-days, to Mr. Pecksniff and to Mr. Chadband, and he would whisper something to the stars about our national genius for hypocrisy. But his interpretation would be quite inadequate. The genius really revealed in the magnificent effrontery of this campaign is simply an unrivalled capacity for seeing everything in the light of "plain business interests." We have no doubt that Lord Burton and his friends really believe that they, not the Government, are the true friends of temperance, that they are making an honest, public-spirited stand for property in general, not for brewery shares in particular, and that if this "confiscatory" law should pass "the savings of no working man would be safe."

But whether we are right or wrong in this interpretation, the published utterances of the last few days make it manifest that with the brewers and the licensed victuallers it is not merely a case of "our trade our politics," but "our trade our religion, our patriotism, our humanity." The cheque of Messrs. Meux and the letter we quote are the plain announcement of the adoption of a policy which unfortunately is not confined to the liquor trade. A year ago a case of the subscription of the London and North-Western Railway Company to the Municipal Reform Society was brought to the attention of Parliament. Mr. Lloyd George, admitting that several other companies had similarly applied the funds of their shareholders to politics, declared his intention of introducing legislation to stop this abuse. Apart from such illicit acts, the subscription of large sums of money to the purposes of the Protectionist campaign in this country by manufacturers and traders who believe that a tariff would put money in their pockets, is a momentous step towards an organised policy of political corruption, which, if unchecked, may sap the foundations of public morality. That is no mere speculation. Under cover of a scientific tariff, or the public fostering of industry, state craft tends in more than one civilised country to become a game of "pulls," "graft," and "boodle," in which strong organised trades are licensed to plunder, and weak ones go to the wall. This new licensing campaign is the most serious attempt yet made to break down and to set aside the wholesome restraints which law and decent usage have in modern times set upon electoral expenses. It is an audacious endeavour to defend a system of tied houses by means of a tied party, to put men into the legislature for the purpose of defending the private business interests of a trade against the interest of the nation whose service they nominally profess. That professional and business interests have always tempered the purity of party politics, and that these interests have sometimes exercised undue and injurious influence in legislation and administration, is of course undeniable. But regrettable as this may be, it differs widely from the prospect which opens before us should this organised use of large trade funds for the sole purpose of financing elections and of buying legislators (for it comes to that) prove successful. It would be foolish pharisaism to pretend that the political conditions of the United States, where a single railroad owns and operates the politics of an entire State, imposing a governor, a senate, and other officials upon the electoral democracy, and where in every city the saloon-keepers are ward-politicians in the pay of some manufacturing trust or street railway, is impossible in this country. The same causes of corruption, permitted to work unchecked, will produce the same results here as in America. It is this consideration of the integrity of our party system and our Government that underlies the little incident of the Meux cheque.

But hardly less significant is the effrontery of the menaces uttered by "the trade" against adherents of the churches and of charitable bodies who should dare to express their opinion in favour of this attempt to reduce the drinking habits of the nation. "Bung" is not only the champion of liberty, property, and public morals. He is also "Defender of the Faith." Who restores the churches, who puts in organs and stained windows, who defends the Church's threatened schools against the plunderers? But shall "the trade" serve God for nought? "One thing is certain," writes a correspondent to the "Daily Telegraph," "if the bishops and clergy of the Church of England, who have rightly and strenuously protested against confiscation when applied to their own schools, throw their principles to the wind, and advocate it when the object happens to suit their views, they will forfeit the confidence of a great number of their followers who, like the writer, have consistently supported them, and have subscribed to their churches, schools, and other objects, but who will no longer be able to entrust them with funds for these objects."

The report of the resolutions of the Church Temperance Society (which the "Times" tucked out of sight amidst the columns of the money market) shows that the bishops and other dignitaries of the Church are not to be browbeaten from the plain path of public duty by these contemptible threats to stop supplies. Possibly they may stimulate reflection in some quarters as to the real meaning of the "unholy alliance" so long informally maintained between these two great appanages of the Conservative Party. The excessive use of alcoholic drink is notoriously responsible for at least half the crime, lunacy, disease, and poverty of our people. Now, in any equitably-ordered society full compensation for this heavy burden of material and moral damage would be exacted from the trade by taxation, instead of permitting it to acquire spurious "merit" by charitable doles. These threats to make the poor, the sick, the children suffer, because religious and moral leaders will not adapt "their views" to the interests of the trade, should arouse our churches and our charitable institutions to a recognition of the danger of reliance upon such benefactors. It is well that the trade should have shown its hand so openly, and that sober-minded people of every creed or party should understand clearly that political corruption, boycott, bribery, menace, and stark mendacity, are to be the weapons with which it chooses to defend its wealth against the Commonwealth.

THE IRISH UNIVERSITY BILL.

MR. BIRRELL hopes to introduce the Irish University Bill towards the close of this month, and most British Liberals will feel, we think, that the first step will have been taken to removing a grave reproach from the Anglo-Irish relationship. Be our views of Irish University education what they may, the subject suggests what Arnold many years ago described as "mortifying thoughts" to progressive minds. The last generation or so has seen Protestant countries setting up Catholic Universities, and Catholic countries Protestant ones. It has witnessed the growth of the popular provincial Universities in England and Wales; it has recorded the conquest, or the partial conquest, of science and modern thought over the old University traditions. But the years have rolled by and Catholic Ireland has waited in vain for all this tide of knowledge and enterprise to enrich her borders. Both parties have admitted her case; both parties have advanced pitiful excuses of expediency for their refusal to touch it. In Mr. Balfour's eyes the Irish plea has presented itself as more of a case of conscience than any political problem which his fastidious, over-critical intellect has encountered. But he recoiled from the difficulties which a mean faction placed in his way. It is now the turn of Liberalism, or rather of a great democratic majority, which, though overwhelmingly Protestant in complexion, represents the permanent Liberal tradition of justice to Ireland. Justice Catholic Ireland has not had in the matter of the higher education of her sons. We hope we shall not hear the argument that she ought to be content with Trinity College, Dublin, or with a Trinity equipped with some of the machinery for the reception of a large element of Catholic scholars. Trinity belongs to Irish Protestantism, in the same sense as Oxford and Cambridge belong to English Protestantism, or, as some years ago, they belonged to Anglicanism. That historic fact would not be changed even if she built a Catholic chapel, and found a companion or so for her lonely Catholic Fellow. Nor, we hope, will it be said that, in these days of Modernism, and of the more democratic type of Catholic University, to establish a fit centre for higher teaching for Irish Catholics is to provide a nursery for superstition. We Liberals profess to be the enlightened party, to speak for the best feeling and intelligence in the modern State; and it is on these aids to national development, as well as on the widely prevailing public sense of equality and right dealing, that we rely when we approach the problem of University education in Ireland.

As to ways and means, Mr. Birrell's path may be made tolerably clear for him. Trinity has pleaded hard to be saved from a scheme of twin colleges under the University of Dublin, such as Mr. Bryce proposed. She wishes to be left alone. She insists that she could not link up her organisation with a Catholic teaching college, that joint lectures, as in biology and palæontology, could not be arranged, that the religious war would break out over the appointment of professorships. We think that she is mistaken, and that the policy of isolation may land her with an unreformed constitution, a dwindling body of students, and a declining reputation in the world of Irish education. But her attitude has this measure of usefulness, that it has practically committed her leading men to watching with equanimity, or even with a certain generous favour, the building up of a College or a University better suited to the needs of Catholic youth. Speaking for his brother professors at Trinity, Mr. Dowden stated in the columns of THE NATION that they "heartily desire a settlement of the matter which shall be approved by their Roman Catholic fellow-countrymen." With this historic obstacle out of the way, Mr. Birrell's thoughts necessarily turn to the best method of meeting the absence of University teaching for Catholic Ireland. He has first to think of religious liberty, and the traditional feeling of his own party as to religious tests. Clearly no Liberal statesman can set his hands to a test-imposing institution, and therefore we may take it for granted that neither the teachers nor the students of any College instituted by this Government will be subject to any religious test whatsoever. Its "atmosphere" will be mainly Catholic, just as the "atmosphere" of Trinity College, Dublin, or of Balliol College, Oxford, is mainly Protestant. But as it will be open to Protestant as well as to Catholic students, neither its professorships nor its governing body can be subject to any exclusive formulae. We do not think that the Catholic bishops have asked for such a condition, and we are quite sure that they would not be granted it if they had. The religious life of the institution must be provided by those who foster that life, and not by the State. As to the governing authority, we suppose that there will naturally be an opening period of nomination by the Crown, which would always, we imagine, retain a certain guardianship. But when that term has expired, the new body, or bodies, would inevitably be, in the main, self-governing. Clergy and laymen would be equally eligible for seats on the council or board, the popular elective corporations which already manage technical education would naturally contribute their quota, and the whole body of graduates would in time come into their rights. We imagine that the scientific and practical side of modern education would be developed, and that women would be admitted both to positions of authority and to degrees.

In the nature of the case, Mr. Birrell would look to a more or less homogeneous system of higher education in Ireland. If Trinity College is left alone, it would seem natural to form a new teaching University out of the Queen's Colleges at Galway and Cork, and to add to it a third college in Dublin, of which the promising, but very poorly endowed, University College would form a nucleus. Presbyterianism would doubtless call for a corresponding University in the North, formed out of the Queen's College at Belfast and the Magee College at Londonderry. The three great religious interests in Ireland—Catholicism, Episcopalianism, and Presbyterianism—would then be fairly supplied with the materials for the higher intellectual training of their youth. The chief task of the Government would, however, be the building and endowment of a new college in Dublin, linked on federal lines with the colleges in Cork and Galway, and well equipped with laboratories and lecture rooms, and other appliances for modern teaching. Mr. Birrell may have some difficulty in resolving the question whether the college shall be residential or non-residential. A good case may be made out for either decision. But, any way, we hope that the endowment of the new institution will be liberal. Trinity is a rich and almost splendid institution, and Catholic Ireland has a great waste of human treasure to make good. British Liberalism and British Nonconformity cannot, of course, render gifts to Ireland which their principles forbid them to give. But in such a plan of University education we should see no bar to their support, but rather an ample ground of generous sympathy.

THE FUTURE OF THE BLACK REPUBLICS.

TROUBLE in Hayti means more to-day than at any period in the Republic's tumultuous history, and the present outbreak may prove the beginning of serious events.

For one thing, it is clear that the right of asylum in the Consulates has been in danger of violation, and this is a development of real significance. The Haytians, not without reason, distrust the white man. For over a hundred years, from the first moment, indeed, of Haytian independence, no foreigner has been allowed to own property in the Republic; but, as in the adjoining State of San Domingo, the sanctity of the Consulates and Legations has hitherto, as a rule, been scrupulously respected, and rebels who have taken refuge in them have usually been allowed the choice between submission and exile. In the present case, it appears that the French and German Consuls were negotiating with the Government for the expatriation of the insurgents who had fled to them for safety; that the Government was reconstituted before the arrangements were completed; and that the new Foreign Minister not only declined to go on with the negotiations, but made a demand upon the Legations for the surrender of the conspirators. As compliance with the demand meant the massacre of the refugees, the Consuls refused to listen to it, and their refusal exposed the Legations to the risk of an attack, and possibly also the entire white community, who are outnumbered by about three thousand to one, to peril of a general onslaught. How real that risk may have been it is impossible to ascertain, but some foreign representatives on the spot, remembering, no doubt, that only a few years ago it was proposed to celebrate the centenary of Haytian independence by a massacre of the whites, knowing the swift alternations of the negro temperament from lethargy to a blind, stabbing fury, and being always conscious of the insecurity of their position, believed it to be formidable and imminent. They accordingly appealed to their respective Governments for protection, and French, German, British, and American men-of-war are now at anchor off Port au Prince.

Their prompt arrival seems, happily, to have warded off the worst of the danger. But the situation is one that in a politically unstable country is almost certain to recur, and, when it does recur, is bound sooner or later to have more than local consequences. Until the representatives of foreign Powers are forbidden to house revolutionaries, the Haytian experiment cannot be said to have been given a fair trial. The present custom of sheltering and protecting all who seek the hospitality of the Legations is a direct incentive to insurrection. It adds to the attractiveness of conspiracy by assuring the conspirator that there is an inviolable asylum open to him if he fails. Besides that, it brings the foreign representatives into the very thick of the domestic plots and intrigues, and encourages them to instigate and forward disorders for ends of their own. To subsidise an insurrection may often present itself as the shortest cut to a valuable concession. Such things have been done and will continue to be done so long as Consulates and Legations remain open for political refugees. To say that the Haytians should be allowed to fight it out among themselves sounds brutal, but is, in truth, humane. They will be much less ready to fight when they know they have no haven of refuge to fall back upon in the event of defeat. The United States, which learned in Chili the international danger of harbouring insurgents, peremptorily forbade its Consul in Hayti to receive any of the conspirators. That is the only sound course to take. If all other Powers had adopted it, the disturbances could not have assumed their present form. If, when this trouble is over, the American rule becomes the universal rule, the chance of disturbances in the future will be greatly diminished. The "Temps" has argued that Europe could not surrender the refugees because by doing so she "would be interfering, in spite of herself, in a domestic quarrel of the Republic of Hayti." It quite fails to see that the original interference took place when "Europe" offered the refugees the security of her Consular agencies.

But although the present disorders seem likely to be adjusted without further intervention on the part of any foreign Power, it remains none the less the fact that their occurrence just now is peculiarly ominous for the future of Hayti as an independent State. The Panama Canal is destined to affect all the West Indian islands, but none more intimately than the island which is at present occupied by the two Republics of Hayti and San Domingo. Hispaniola, to revive the name given it by Columbus, lies between Cuba and Porto Rico, directly in the path of ocean communication from Europe and Eastern America to the Isthmus. The two channels that lend themselves most readily to outward and homeward bound vessels flow past its shores. When the Canal is completed Hispaniola will command the entrances to it, and its supreme strategic importance will almost inevitably connect itself with the question of its political future. Already the two-thirds of the island occupied by San Domingo is in the hands of American receivers. The remaining third, dominating the windward passage, and occupied by the Republic of Hayti, is scarcely likely under any circumstances to keep free much longer from a somewhat similar form of control. The modern world is crowding upon it inevitably; the opening of the Isthmian waterway will revolutionise all its internal possibilities and all its external relations; and every disturbance that occurs within its boundaries will furnish another argument for bringing it under white supervision. Before another decade has gone by the fate of Hayti may be that of the Transvaal.

For a hundred years the Haytians have governed themselves. The world has heard much of their failures and little of their successes. Their revolutions and assassinations, their operatic army, the slovenliness of their towns, the stagnation of their agriculture, all this is the tittle-tattle of every visitor. They have been ridiculed, despised, maligned. Within the last few days almost every journal has repeated the hackneyed charges that Voodooism is still the popular religion, and that the people have gone backwards and not forwards since the expulsion of the French. Both charges are false. The civilisation of Hayti is little, if at all, lower than that of the average Central American Republic. So far from "relapsing into barbarism," the people, inch by inch, have forced a toilsome path upwards. They were the first to abolish slavery, and the first to attempt to build up a negro government under modern forms. Their difficulties were immense. The war that expelled the French had left the island little more than a heap of ashes. The Haytians had to create for themselves and without external aid of any kind all the instrumentalities of administration. They have not evolved an ideal system either of government or of education, but there is little reason for thinking that they would have been more orderly, happier, or more prosperous under foreign rule. They may not have developed their resources to the fullest extent. Their railways, their telephones and telegraphs, may not reach the American or European standards. But they have, at all events, become imbued with a strong sense of nationality and a resolute pride of independence, and they have saved themselves from being exploited by white capital or demoralised by white vices or contaminated by white blood. Those are considerable achievements of a negative kind, enough, at any rate, to make the task of conquering or controlling them very formidable. That foreign civilisation will be thrust upon them eventually seems most probable, and that the exports of coffee, cocoa, logwood and cotton, the building of roads and railways, and the opening up of mines would be greatly increased thereby may be taken for granted. But it is another question whether the people will be better off, morally or materially, under the new dispensation.

WANTED—AN UNEMPLOYMENT BILL.

THE results of the debate on the Unemployed Workmen Bill will be of grave importance, not only in declaring the attitude of the Labour Party and in defining lines of cleavage which have been obvious for long, but in showing that if the Government is to command the convinced support of its followers, it will be necessary to attack the problem of unemployment with positive proposals of constructive legislation. The grave defects of the Bill, and especially of the third clause, were explained in these columns last week. A clause which insists that local authorities must either find maintenance for the unemployed in their district, or provide work upon conditions not lower than those that are standard to the work in the locality, commits the Labour Party to proposals which would inevitably cut away the whole basis of our industrial life. Its destroyers would then have to begin the reconstruction of State-organised industry out of the least efficient materials, or even from the sheer waste, of our existing system. Yet in spite of this clause, and in the face of a Government whip, no fewer than sixty-seven Liberal members voted for the Bill against the official amendment.

What is the cause of this demonstration? It shows that progressive opinion is dissatisfied with the existing state of the law, and is unwilling to await indefinitely the report of the Poor-law Commission. Mr. Burns had no difficulty in exposing the central weakness of the "right to work" clause, in the form in which it was drafted. He claimed that our existing public labour colonies were costly failures, which the Bill would multiply over the whole country. It was perhaps natural for a man of Mr. Burns's temperament and special gifts and experience to take an optimistic view of social progress during the last generation. But it is unfortunate that scarcely a hint should have fallen from his lips of the need for further reform. His criticisms of the labour colonies at Hollesley Bay and Ockenden were hotly challenged across the floor of the House, and it must not be forgotten that these colonies have throughout been so hemmed in by the restrictions of the Local Government Board that they have been unable to carry out the schemes for experimental small holdings which their advocates considered to be their chief raison d'être. No satisfactory attempt has been made in afforestation, a remedial measure which Mr. Burns has repeatedly commended. Yet it is a plan peculiarly suited to State and centralised action. Its returns of profit can only accrue after a long lapse of years, and thus it is never likely to attract the capital of the investor, or to be carried out extensively by private enterprise. We are glad, therefore, to see that the President of the Local Government Board has advanced from his rather hard negotiations in the House of Commons. Speaking last Tuesday at the annual banquet of the Association of Municipal Corporations, he made the helpful suggestion that more extensive use might be made for purposes of afforestation of the vast areas of water supply already owned by the great municipalities. He also suggested that unemployment in the seasonal trades might largely be alleviated if care were taken by municipalities to carry out works of repair and cleaning during the slack season. But in neither case is there any hint of new machinery, or of anything better than the wiser and more thoughtful management of existing powers by local authorities.

This is all the more regrettable in that one remedy for unemployment, upon the value of which there is a remarkable convergence of opinion, has already been called into being by means of the very imperfect machinery of the Act of 1905. The system of employment exchanges, if properly connected throughout the country by means of a public central department, would be a ready instrument for making known the state of the labour market in various centres. It would encourage the free transfer of surplus labour from place to place and business to business. It would increase the mobility of labour as a whole, and it would be of service alike to employers and to employed. In the March number of the "Economic Journal," Mr. W. H. Beveridge points out how great an economic advantage Germany has gained through the linked system of public labour exchanges, which were established there after the great trade depression of 1893-97, at a time when with us the House of Commons satisfied itself by appointing a Select Committee which never reported. In Germany exchanges are already at work in some sixty centres; in almost every town, in fact, with a population of more than fifty thousand. Some of these are managed by the municipality; others privately, with municipal subvention; while inter-communication is promoted by a grant from the Imperial Government. It is interesting, too, to note that in Germany the initial hostility of the trade union organisations and of employers has been replaced by frank acceptance of the system, and in many cases by hearty co-operation with it. With all its faults, indeed, the Act of 1905 made an advance in the right direction. After two years' working it is possible to judge how far the London labour exchanges have succeeded in overcoming the misunderstandings with which their origin was surrounded. The twenty-three metropolitan exchanges, linked together by telephonic communication with a central exchange, have succeeded in steadily attracting the skilled labourer and the better-class employer, and as their use extends, they will simplify the problem of unemployment by reducing the existing reserves of casual labour. They cannot, of course, remove an actual surplus. But the process of "de-casualisation" which they will facilitate will make it clear where a real surplus exists, and leave it open to the action of special remedies.

Useful as is this experience, it is unfortunate that it should occur under the auspices of an Act which, in spite of its avowed object, is popularly supposed to deal, not with the temporary unemployment incidental to the changes of modern industry, but with men who are in varying degrees "unemployable." If, as seems likely to be the case, the Act should be prolonged, it should surely be possible for the Government to separate from the work of distress committees and labour colonies a system of labour exchanges which should form part of the healthy industrial organisation of the State, instead of dealing merely with remedies for its diseased members. The difficult curative treatment involved in the reform of the Poor-law, in the establishment of a graded series of labour colonies to deal with those who, from various causes, physical or moral, are for the time at least unemployable, must necessarily be postponed until the Poor-law Commission has reported. But preventive measures stand upon a somewhat different footing. Pending other reforms, it should surely be possible for Parliament to promote an object whose utility is now generally recognised. A connected national system of labour exchanges, under efficient supervision, is already long overdue. Its establishment would at once dam up a great waste of time and money to workmen and to their employers, and a great consequent loss of labour and character. A Liberal Government cannot afford to do nothing, or to rest content with a vigilant but rather narrow and unsympathetic administration of existing and very imperfect agencies. Its business is to survey the whole industrial field, and to see where its true productiveness can be enhanced in the now neglected corner of unemployment.

THE EIGHT HOURS DAY.

WITH the proposal of an eight hours day, as expressing the need for increased leisure and as a factor in a sound social and industrial policy, we are in hearty sympathy. Nor should we hesitate to apply legal pressure to level up to this as a normal standard. But it is to be regretted that the Labour Party should have injured this genuinely progressive cause, as they injured the unemployed relief cause last week, by clothing it in a cast-iron regulation which will not bear close investigation. As several speakers, favourable to the general policy, pointed out in Wednesday's debate, it is both inequitable and impracticable to prescribe the same legal maximum of hours for all sorts of workers in all sorts of trades, and to insist that no elasticity or adjustment shall be allowed to meet those irregularities and emergencies which weather and other forms of pressure inherent in the conditions of many industries impose upon large branches of production. A rigorous eight hours' day, or any other precise limit, is obviously inapplicable to such work as agriculture or fishing, and where, as in the case of cotton, a huge export trade is done, often in keen competition with foreign workers, nothing short of international legislation along the lines of last year's Berne Convention could prevent dangerous reactions upon such trades.

Again, while it is no doubt true that in some cases a legal eight hours' day might absorb some unemployed, or might spread the same volume of employment over a somewhat larger number of men working the shorter day, it cannot be confidently urged as a cure for national unemployment, as Labour men are sometimes prone to urge it. For, if it does cause more men to be employed at rates of wages not lower than before, but somewhat higher (because the pressure of employed labour will be reduced), the wage-bill rises, and unless the profits of employers are abnormal, as in a monopoly or during a trade boom, the increase of the wage-bill will imply a rise of prices to consumers. If this occurs, high prices, checking demand, will react injuriously upon employment, and the futility of "eight hours day" as a remedy for unemployment may become manifest.

The case for a legal eight hours day is argued far more forcibly upon the contention that in many, or most, trades a long day is a slack day, and that a reasonable reduction of hours, accompanied by certain economies of business administration, enables the output to be maintained at nearly the same level as before. Here, of course, is no remedy for unemployment, but an increased concentration of productive effort. Mr. Samuel, in his able and sympathetic speech, pointed to the case of the War Office Factories, which, after reducing their times of labour by five and three-quarter hours a week, were able to maintain the same output. It is simply a question of the compressibility of labour-power, and this will vary with the conditions of each trade and each set of workers. While, therefore, a general reduction of hours is both feasible and advantageous, the mechanical imposition by law on all trades alike of a maximum working day is not the way to do it.

We gladly note, however, the determination of the Government, expressed by Mr. Samuel, to press the eight hours law for miners through Parliament this session. The tone of opposition adopted by the employers, who met last Tuesday at Cannon Street Hotel, is at least as unreasonable and unreasoning as that of the least instructed of labour leaders. The estimate of Sir John Ellerman and others that the passing of the Government Bill would mean a restriction of output and a rise of price amounting to 1s. 6d. a ton, was rightly described by Mr. Samuel as "a fantastic estimate supported by no argument—an absurd exaggeration of the probable, or even the possible, effect." As the able Report of Mr. Rea's Committee last year showed, the reduction of output which would seem to follow the shortening of the work-day would be far smaller than is commonly computed. As soon as the temporary disturbance had settled down, the improved efficiency of labour, improvements in the mechanical equipment of collieries, including an extended use of labour-saving machinery and of the multiple shift system, would probably recover most of the immediate loss which seemed to be entailed. There is no reason whatever for the outcry of the railways and the gas companies about the enhancement of home prices, or for the alarm expressed by Mr. Balfour regarding the export trade in coal, which to most of his Protectionist friends is such a bugbear. The very thorough and scientific inquiry of the Committee shows that we need not anticipate any serious normal reduction of output, or rise of price, or reduction of export trade in coal, as results of the very moderate and well-planned Bill which is shortly to come before the House of Commons.

Life and Letters.

THE WORLD AS A TUNE.

I SUPPOSE it will be allowed that, broadly speaking, the mind of man communicates with its circumstance in one of two ways; either by the reasonable perception of co-ordination, or by the artistic perception of beauty. These perhaps appear discrete, and even hostile, faculties of man's nature; but not wisely are they so judged. The barrier between them is like one of the "hedges of mist" in Celtic legend, a fence of wilful illusion. Not only are both these faculties manifestations of the one grand substratum of human nature, which (for lack of a better term) we must call emotion; but they are manifestations not extraordinarily different in kind. They are a yoke of horses driven by emotion—horses which differ in colour and feature, but are plainly of the same breeding. It is true they are commonly harnessed in tandem, and the shaft-horse gets most of the whip and does most of the work—it is matter for individual choice which horse shall be given the place of responsibility; but they are usually both there. A man rarely cuts the traces of his leader, whichever it be, and drives with one horse only.

But the point needing emphasis is that scientific and artistic modes of thought are not to be violently separated. The poet who perceived a sense of tears in things drove a different horse from that of the scientist who perceived natural selection in things; but both horses came from the same stud. Again, to one intellect, the stones on the highway have "a moral life"; to another the atoms of carbon have a tetrahedral shape. Both these are prophetic visions of a grandeur so overpowering as almost to stupefy reverence. The one is a poet's, the other a scientist's vision; but they both have the same purpose. They are the attempts of two intellects to make the universe go into rhyme with human emotion. All ideal operations of mind have this ultimate purpose; and scientific discoveries, like tragedies or symphonies, proceed from within outwards. We are so accustomed to credit the artistic creator with emotional inspiration that it is something of a shock, perhaps, to hear the scientific inventor credited with precisely the same inspiration. But assuredly Joule was as much prompted by his emotion to discover the Conservation of Energy as Beethoven was to compose the Seventh Symphony. The one out of his knowledge of physics, the other out of his knowledge of counterpoint, contrived satisfaction for the emotional need within him.

The obscure necessities of man's soul, in fact, compel him to fashion his perception of the world into images, whether scientific or artistic, which accord with his innermost incomprehensible feelings; and we measure the scientific truth of generalisations as we measure the artistic truth of poems, by the satisfaction they give to our emotions; or, as I said above, by instinctively noting whether they rhyme with that which is within us. Mendeléef and Lothar Meyer discovered the Periodic Law not primarily as satisfaction for reason but for soul; we all acknowledge the truth of their discovery on account of a like satisfaction. There is no knowing what these cravings of man's soul of emotion are; but they can be dimly guessed at by observing to what use it puts its two main instruments, the two principal modes of formal thought, the artistic and the scientific.

This may explain how it is that the most modern scientific thought seems to be reverting to the same conclusions as were arrived at by ancient empiric speculation. Our methods of communicating with the world of phenomena have altered; but that which desires to communicate is the same as ever it was. The business of the mind is to make the world speak acceptable things to the soul; though the dialect may have varied, a greeting that was acceptable of old is acceptable at the present day—a message unacceptable then is still unacceptable. Thus chemistry now agrees with alchemy in believing in, at any rate evolutionary, transmutation of the elements. For it is scientifically held that the chemical elements are not fixed, eternal, separate existences, but are rather various modes of being of one primary substance, or "protyle." While it is probable that the elements were not formed one out of another, but under varying conditions out of the primary substance, it is also probable that certain elements, which may be considered as highly complex modes of being for the "protyle" (radio-active elements, in fact), do actually break down into simpler modes; for instance, into Helium. Creation then is the conversion of the "protyle," or informal, indefinite, undimensional ether into matter formal, definite, and dimensional. How was it done?

Anciently, the fixation of things was attributed to the "sweet compulsion" of a divine music, such as could—

"Keep unsteady Nature to her law,
And the low world in measured motion draw
After the heavenly tune."

We are not so very far from this nowadays, with our Periodic Law. According to this, if we tabulate the elements in order of atomic weight (that is, the measure of the supposed mass of the atom), they form themselves into a gamut which is subdivisible into well-defined groups or families, each group having the same chemical properties. In fact, matter, like an ode, is an affair of periods. Or again, the elements, arranged according to atomic weight, show a progression of physical properties which is not uniform, but as it were, in a series of waves, regularly rising and falling, the size of the wave always increasing. What is this but to say that the elements known to us are the fixation of some incomprehensible rhythm which beat once through the unconditioned ether, the created symbols of some "heavenly tune"? Our world consists of probably six complete pulsations or waves of that creative rhythm. But how long that tune was a-playing? why it should have stopped where it did? and how it seized the ether permanently into the condition of its own pattern?—these unanswered questions now form the dissatisfaction of that portion of the human soul which operates science. The cure of this dissatisfaction is therefore the chief business now of science which cannot help obeying man's emotional needs any more than art can. In hopes of finding this cure, science is enormously preoccupied at present with such matters as radio-activity and the nature of electricity.

It would seem that rhythm is the main need of the soul, or fundamental emotion, of man. There is no call to labour the point as regards art; and as for science, she explains almost every sensuous happening in terms of rhythm. This need of man's has refused to allow science to stop investigating heat, light, or sound, until she could confidently say: These phenomena also are rhythm; so the soul's rigorous demand was satisfied, and those phenomena were made acceptable and tolerable. The same need appears also in man's instinctive demand for a presentation of the beginning of things. Rhythmic creation and rhythmic stability for the world are fundamentally required; nothing else will satisfy man. Accordingly science, as the ancient philosophic speculations did before, is busily preparing for man some such rhythmic presentation of the beginning of things. In this direction the formulation and proof of the Periodic Law is one of the first steps, and other steps are rapidly following. We see the material atoms resolved into corpuscles of electricity, and electricity itself having an atomic structure. These, and many more discoveries, made and making, will all go to build into scientific certainty the old notion of the world as expression of rhythm—or why should we not say tune? Not otherwise will science satisfy the longing of man's soul; therefore there is no rest for science till she has done so, and proved the world to be what, deep down in his unsearchable being, man feels that it must be.

And whence came that longing into the soul of man, the undefined need that so imperiously employs science and art to define its circumstance into harmony with itself? Perhaps that which for convenience we label "soul," like Landor's shell "remembers its august abodes." Perhaps it is of the same nature as that impulse of creative measure through the undisciplined and unappointed ether; and so of necessity must insist on the knowledge which ministers to it rendering such an account of the world as will be tolerable to its implanted conviction—or, might we not say, to its memory?

LASCELLES ABERCROMBIE.

THE RIDDLE OF THE MIDDLE AGES.

SHALL we ever reconstruct, in any vivid and effective fashion, the everyday life of medieval England? Authorities of experts differ as far as light from darkness. Authorities of experts of the opening twentieth century differ as greatly concerning the world of to-day. Imagine five hundred years hence the historians of the present time attempting such a reconstruction of our own generation. They might have before them the works of Ruskin and Carlyle, steeped in gloom, earthquake, and eclipse: newspaper articles on Free Trade explaining that never was England more prosperous, confident and free: newspaper articles on Protection, lamenting an enormous spongy mass of pauperism and misery, twelve millions on the verge of hunger: the testimony of life in the abyss, confronting the testimony of unparalleled wealth and greatness. In such circumstance each would be inclined to emphasise the facts which reconciled themselves with his main thesis, each would select, consciously or unconsciously, by temperament rather than by evidence. And the same is true of the historian of medieval times. Mr. Coulton, a scholar of European distinction, hating Catholicism and the ideals of celibacy and priestly dominance, reveals a Middle Age which is almost a delirium. There is continuous fighting, squalor, and wretchedness, an almost savage cruelty, vice openly defiant of regulation, vows and rules everywhere violated: an age of disorder, ruin, and picturesque decay.

But then Father Gasquet, a scholar of European distinction and a liberal Catholic, discovers, in the same material, piety, simplicity, a child-like faith and aspiration. Monasteries do their appointed work of prayer and labour. Parishes own their churches and take pride in them. Education is free and widespread. Class divisions are abolished. Starvation is unknown. To Froude, again, who combined an essential honesty with bias, the Reformation is the sinking of the twilight before the coming of the day: and the violent and brutal policy of Henry VIII. is the necessary stern work from which shall arise the spacious days of Elizabeth, and all the splendour of the modern world. But to Canon Jessopp, a "broad" Anglican, the spoliation of the monasteries by Cromwell, and of the parish churches by Edward VI., is little less than the rapacious greed of sovereign and nobles, from whose malignant efforts has grown a problem of poverty, under which England is still groaning, whose end is not yet. Cobbett scandalised his generation with the same impeachment. William Morris saw medieval England as a land of colour and artistic beauty, with London a high, gabled city, "small and white and clean," and everywhere white churches and cathedrals rising as the product of men whose minds were free: and ladies in green with golden hair, looking over tall battlements or from high, gabled windows upon shining-armoured knights, who rode forth with crimson pennons into the adventures of all the world. Even Thorold Rogers, to whom the artistic appeal was as nothing, could argue from the dispassionate tables of variation in economic prices and wages, for the "Golden Age" of the English poor being placed in the century and a-half before the Reformation. "The rate of production was small," he acknowledged, "the conditions of health unsatisfactory, and the duration of life short. But on the whole there were none of those extremes of poverty and wealth which have excited the astonishment of phil-anthropists, and are now exciting the indignation of workmen." "The age, it is true," he declares, "had its discontents, and these discontents were expressed forcibly and in a startling manner. But of poverty which perishes unheeded, of a willingness to do honest work and a lack of opportunity, there was little or none. The essentials of life in England during the days of the Plantagenets and Tudors were that everyone knew his neighbour, and that everyone was his brother's keeper."

Some characteristic peepholes into the existence of this strange, remote time—the seed time of the modern world—are provided in Dom Gasquet's latest volume of Essays, "The Last Abbot of Glastonbury, and Other Essays," by F. A. Gasquet, D.D. (George Bell & Sons). They cover a varied range, over two hundred years, from an examination of English Biblical Criticism in the thirteenth century, or the story of English family life in pre-Reformation days, to the account of two great fifteenth century feasts at Wells, or the pitiful record of how the great storm fell upon the best as well as the worst in the medieval Church, and involved both in one common disaster. Dom Gasquet can reveal an England before the Reformation, in which poverty and much hardness of life unquestionably existed. But "what did not exist in Catholic times was that peculiar product which sprang up so plentifully amid the ruins of Catholic institutions overthrown by Tudor sovereigns—pauperism." He shows the laymen owning the furniture and delighting in the splendour of the village churches. "The local church was to them a living reality; it was theirs, and all it contained, in an absolute and sometimes almost a startling way." It was a way, indeed, so startling that sometimes the gift of the altar was deliberately sacrificed for works of public charity and necessity: as in Yatton, in Somersetshire, where for the repair of certain sluices to keep back the winter floods the parish decided that to raise the necessary cash "they would sell a piece of silver church plate which had been purchased some years before by the common contributions of the faithful." In exhibiting the family life of the medieval time he can reveal from testimony and exhortation simplicity and piety, early rising, morning and evening prayer. Here are men and women who, to the wonder of the Venetian Ambassador, even in the early sixteenth century, "all attend Mass every day, and say many paternosters in public"; children who, every evening on pain of being "whysked with a good rod," kneeling before their parents "axe blessing as 'Father, I beseech you of blessing for charity,' 'Mother, I beseech you of charity give me your blessing.'"

The vanishing of this solemn, child-like world, full of natural tears and laughter, is revealed, as an illustration, in the story of the life and death of Richard Whiting, last Abbot of Glastonbury. Nestling under its high hill set in an unequalled panorama, the ruins of this once mightiest and most venerated of all English monasteries still cherish the story of that great destruction. Its history goes far back behind Norman and Roman to the dim legends of the Arthurian tradition; encompassing a multitude of every century "whose souls now rejoice," says an ancient writer, "in the possession of God in heaven." Richard Whiting was elected Abbot when the House was still at the summit of its glory; the first monastery of the West, with revenues greater than those of the Archbishop of Canterbury, whose Abbot held a seat in the House of Lords and ruled over fertile and populous lands. In 1525, after "first determining to refuse," and then "after demanding time for thought and prayer," being, as he declared, "unwilling any longer to offer resistance to what appeared the will of God," this simple monk accepted a burden and dazzling dignity which were to lead him to a terrible end. But for Anne Boleyn and Henry VIII.'s subsequent imperious demand for money, this man might have passed his blameless space of innocent days to rest at last in a forgotten tomb. Sir Thomas More had seen the danger already near. "Ever tell him," he had written of his master to Cromwell, "what he ought to do, but not what he is able to do. For if a lion but knew his own strength, hard were it for any man to rule him." The "lion" came to know "his own strength," and broke in pieces the old order of society which had existed for a thousand years. The English Reformation was different not only in degree but in kind from the German. The latter was a democratic movement towards freedom, culminating in the anarchy of the Peasants' Revolt. The former, with its many fine sides led to the aggrandisement of the royal authority, which was not broken till a century and a-half afterwards. The common people, when they were not stricken with astonishment or terrified by fear, everywhere, outside the new commercial classes of the towns, were on the side of the older order. In Cromwell's ten years' reign of terror, Glastonbury was marked for destruction. The only crime of the Abbot was that he stood in the way of the acquisition of the monasteries' wealth for the Crown. That crime was sufficient. He entertained five hundred poor every Wednesday and Friday. A great prince of the Church, his bed remains to-day, "without tester or post, boarded at bottom, with a board nailed shelving at the head." Leland, in his antiquarian journey through England, found him "a man truly upright, and of a spotless life, and my sincere friend." In 1535 the unspeakable Layton arrived at Glastonbury, to collect evidence of disorder or immorality. He could find "nothing notable." "The brethren be so straight kept," he announced, "that they cannot offend"; but he characteristically adds, "for they would if they might, as they confess, and so the fault is not with them." Cromwell and the King were furious at this failure, for which Layton humbly apologised. Money was essential; and the great monasteries possessed it. "All the wealth of the world," wrote the French Ambassador of Henry VIII., "would not be enough to satisfy and content his ambition." Four years after the visit of Layton, Glastonbury was the only religious house left standing in Somersetshire: the others had all been pillaged, desecrated, destroyed. Its reprieve was short-lived. In September, 1539, the Royal Commissioners arrived at Glastonbury. The Abbot was dispatched to London, to the Tower; accompanying him on his journey was a catalogue of the booty seized for the benefit of the King. The trial was of the kind familiar in the Revolutionary Tribunals of the Reign of Terror; execution had been decided before sentence, and sentence before verdict. "Item," runs the entry, in Cromwell's own hand, "the Abbot of Glaston to be tried at Glaston, and also executed there." He was tied on a hurdle, and dragged through the town which once he had ruled as a sovereign. On the hill above the Abbey he was hanged, drawn, and quartered, under a sentence of high treason. One quarter of his body was dispatched to Wells, one to Bath, one to Ilchester, a fourth to Bridgewater; the head was fixed over the gate of the Abbey, a warning of the vengeance which was destined for all who resisted the imperial will of the King of England.

He was nearly eighty years old: an old man, belonging to a dying world, and dying with it; like his two companions, taking his death "very patiently." In the old religion he is venerated as a martyr for the faith. Those who are not of the old religion may do honour to the memory of a brave man. Glastonbury Abbey has stood forlorn, deserted, beautiful in its ruin and decay, for nearly four hundred years.

THE SOUL OF A PEOPLE.

THE more we know about a race the less we generalise, and if you want to discover the English character, you must stand at Charing Cross and ask the foreign travellers fresh from the Channel. With each succeeding day in our country they will tell you less. Inquire what the Russians are like from a week-end tourist in St. Petersburg, and he will reel you off a magazine article of qualities; ask a seven years' resident, and he is dumb. The crowding cases of diversity have blinded him to general truth, and it is the fresh eye that sees the clearest. It may not be so with philosophers; those freaks of wisdom are believed to go on piling up fact upon fact, instance upon instance, in the hope of saying something of value before they die. But ordinary people start with their generalisation, and leave it further and further behind them the longer they live and the more they learn.

That is why it is impossible to obey the old precept and know oneself. There is nothing we have known so long as ourselves, and that long familiarity has spoilt our chance of ever knowing what we are. How readily we sum up an acquaintance of yesterday! But we seldom characterise an old friend, and when it comes to characterising that oldest friend of all, who has been so long the intimate guest of our body, we find in him such a host of contradictions, variations, and possibilities that we refuse to proceed. We are dumbfounded by the immensity of the task, and the ready summaries of our acquaintance rather annoy us, even when they are flattering. A Shrewsbury boy delineated the very soul of two of the masters on a wall. One of them pointed out the picture of the other with grateful appreciation, but turning to his own image he said, "I cannot think whom this strange figure may represent."

This quick generalisation is the power of the caricaturist. None of us have seen an Englishman like John Bull, but he stands for England. We are not aware that Englishwomen have long teeth and longer feet, but the French are. No Irishman sees his countrymen brandishing sticks and shouting "Begorrah!" No German adores the Fatherland as the home of a tubby student with a pipe and a pot of beer. We doubt if even Mr. Chamberlain knew what a Brer Fox he would make till the "Westminster Gazette" showed him, and Mr. Gladstone was never conscious of his dynamic collars. Excess of knowledge puzzles the view, and custom comes in to complete the blindness. "Let the sun rise twice," said the wise man, "and we cease to wonder." We do not only cease to wonder, we cease to look. What is habitual is never seen, and there is nothing so habitual as ourselves.

That is why the most penetrating books on countries and peoples are always written by foreigners. "Nothing is commonplace as seen for the first time," wrote Lafcadio Hearn, whose "Letters from the Raven" have just appeared as an addition to the much more valuable collection of his letters published last year. In the new volume there is little of personal interest. They are not particularly good letters, and most of them were written long before Lafcadio Hearn discovered his true power in life. Indeed, their only importance is the assurance they give us of his purely literary cast of mind from youth—the cast of mind which induced him to preserve his own old love-letters when they were returned to him, because he recognised literary excellence in their style. Still, they do, at all events, contain one sentence which is worth preserving. He calls it a quotation from the Talmud:—

"There are three whose life is no life: the Sympathetic man, the Irascible, and the Melancholy."

Probably Hearn meant to include himself among the Melancholy in his lamentation, and he was melancholy. But it is as the Sympathetic man that he interests us now, just as it is the mention of the class Sympathetic that gives its interest to the Talmud text.

Place the Sympathetic man as a stranger in a foreign land, and you get some chance of hearing what the land is like. Place the lady who calls herself Pierre de Coulevain in a London suburb or a country house, and you get a portrait of the English educated classes beyond the power of the Englishman to draw. Place Miss Margaret Noble in a Calcutta slum, let her call herself Sister Nivedita, and in her "Web of Indian Life" you will see the heart of Hinduism revealed as no official with ten languages on his tongue and the Statistical Abstract in his pocket has ever revealed it. Place Mr. Fielding Hall on the Irawaddy, and the soul of the Burmese people will pervade the air of literature like a perfume full of memories.

But no one has been a better instance of these powers than Lafcadio Hearn himself. That delicate mixture of Greek and Irish blood, humanised by the scrappy, happy-go-lucky training of American struggle, which did not encrust his sympathies with the hard coating of uniformity such as an English public school deposits round the natural heart—that was exactly the right sort of nature for the task which he happily found. He found it late, by accident, as it were. We believe he was over forty before he set about it, and he was not much over fifty when he died. But in those few years, in those few little books of his, he drew a picture of the Japanese soul such as no one else has drawn. Hardly any names are mentioned, hardly any places are described; no account is taken of the sights that occupy most books of travel. Quite ordinary things are spoken of—the evening walk in spring, the fisherman's prayers, the singing insects in their cages, the fairy stories, the nursery rhymes, the uses of a woman's sleeve. But in these common things the quintessence of a people's soul is caught, just as one painter in a generation will sometimes catch the quintessence of a face or of a landscape's mood. We find in him, almost to perfection, that gift of delicate realisation with which Pierre Loti is often credited; falsely credited we think, for Pierre Loti's most subtle visions are nearly always tinged with conceit and personal desire, so that when they have passed before you in turn, you feel that you have been watching a magic-lantern of the various ways in which Pierre Loti, of the French Navy and Academy, has made love to women of many different colours.

As so often happens, Lafcadio Hearn seems to have come only just in time before the soul he drew faded into another incarnation. Probably he knew that the spiritual colours of his picture were already vanishing. To an eye like his they may still be there, but since the first revelation in his books the soul of Japan has turned a new aspect towards the outer world, and in contrast to the clash of ships and the rows of devoted dead outside the ramparts, the dainty manners that Hearn described so well are beginning to look a little precious, a little finikin. When a Japanese ship was reported in the Thames a few years ago, people went down to the docks expecting to see a scarlet junk with a yellow sail, and a dragon's tail for rudder. But they found an ordinary Glasgow steamer, with nothing Japanese about her except the crew and the teacups. That kind of shock we feel when we turn from Lafcadio Hearn's chapter on dragon-flies to the arsenals of Yokohama, or wherever the arsenals are.

Let us not be shocked, but rather marvel at the race which can equally well construct a battleship and cram into the regulation fifteen syllables of a complete poem all the suggested emotion that the Japanese poetess put into a lament for her dead son while she watched the other children at play in the season of dragon-flies:

"Catching the dragon-flies!

—I wonder where

He has gone to-day!"

It is commonly said of Hearn that in his books he created a Japan such as never was on land or sea. If so, it was greatly to his credit. But that kind of criticism need never trouble us. Dull people raise the same objection against Sister Nivedita and Mr. Fielding Hall. They raised the same objection to Turner's pictures, and his well-worn answer is still sufficient for them all: "You say you never saw a sunset like that, madam? Don't you wish you could!" And as to the value of Hearn's work and its estimation in Japan itself, let us remember the words of a famous Japanese poet on hearing the news of his death: "Surely we could better have lost two or three battleships."

MODERN DAFFODILS AND NARCISSI.

THE every-day flower-lover, whose knowledge of daffodils is limited to a few of the old kinds, such as the Codlins and Cream, the Lent Lily, and the Poet's (not he of Swinford Old Manor), would be considerably astonished if he were to visit a show of Spring flowers where some of the modern forms were on view. He would discover that some mysterious process of fusion had been going on, as a result of which the characters of his favourites had become blended in one. He would see flowers that reminded him at once of a trumpet daffodil and a star narcissus, and yet had a something superimposed upon them which belonged to neither.

Bulb experts tell us that while a daffodil is always a narcissus, a narcissus is only a daffodil when the central crown, or trumpet, is as long as the outer or wing petals, which he ponderously (although with strict accuracy) calls perianth segments. When the crown is cut back to a mere cup the flower is no longer a daffodil. The true daffodil, he may proceed to inform us, is the Lent Lily, known in exclusive botanical circles as Narcissus pseudo-narcissus. Of course, nobody takes any notice of this nowadays. Narcissus is a stiff word, daffodil a homely one; therefore, on the lay tongue all narcissi are daffodils; but we must make some little effort to realise where we are before we become involved in this new spring mystery of the garden.

Well, the genus narcissus is divided into species, of which the daffodil is one. A few others are the "hoop petticoat," technically called bulbocodium; incomparabilis, which came from Portugal some 280 years ago, and is the parent of the star narcissi; Jonquilla, or the Jonquil, also from the Peninsula, a still older plant; juncifolius, or rush-leaved; major, maximus and minor, three yellow trumpets of great antiquity; poeticus, the white, May-flowering poet's narciss; tazetta, the bunch flowered; and triandrus, the Angel's tears narciss. This is not quite the whole list of distinctive species, but it is very nearly so; and when we contemplate it, and then survey the catalogues densely packed with names, we realise what an extraordinary work the hybridist has done. First of all, he took the species and crossed them. He began this so long ago that some of the earliest of his children, such as Barrii, Backhousei, Burbidgei, Humei, Leedsii, and Nelsoni, have become old stagers, and one hardly thinks of them as hybrids at all. They have given their names to sections, and become respected members of daffodil society.

The deluge came when a later generation of hybridists, with the Rev. G. H. Engleheart at their head, crossed the already crossed. Then, indeed, Narcissus "himself himself forsook." Staid, sedate fathers and mothers of families formed new unions, and a numerous brood sprang up, entirely different from the old. It was at once seen that the old botanical classification would have to go. New systems were discussed. Whenever daffodil experts got together, they talked about fresh ways of classifying the flowers, and they are talking about it still. The fact is, the task is beyond them. They have not the least idea where to begin and where to end. They can raise new daffodils by cross-fertilising the flowers, sowing the seeds and selecting the best and most distinct of the progeny; they can give the chosen ones distinct varietal names, such as "Cullinan diamond" (this is an effort on the part of the writer, but "The Twins" is an accomplished fact!), yet appropriate group terms, such as politicians achieve with such fertile ingenuity, are beyond them.

Where experts fail laymen will naturally come to grief, and, after all, it matters little to them how new daffodils are made or how they are classified, so long as they are beautiful and accessible. As to the former quality, there cannot be two opinions. Most of the seedlings which Mr. Engleheart has introduced during the past ten years are exquisitely lovely. The distinguishing feature of the work of this floral wizard is the distinction which he has imparted to the crown. Not content with making the whites whiter and the yellows yellower, he has formed reds, and we ask ourselves where it will end. Will he follow up the "Blood Orange," the "Red Star," the "Bullfinch," the "Cardinal," the "Lucifer," the "Redcoat," the "Firebrand," the "Gloria Mundi," the "Glitter," with still richer colours? If so, the day may come when we shall see daffodils with the vivid scarlet of a field poppy, or the crimson of a "King Edward" Sweet Pea. These things do not seem to be impossible, in view of what has already been done.

The second point—accessibility—is not so easily settled. Daffodils at £20 a bulb would form a text for Mr. Victor Grayson. There are purses long enough for the occasion, but it is not every flower-lover who owns one. However, it is only the very newest sorts that stand at these mine-magnate figures. The exclusives of half-a-dozen years ago are within the means of the average amateur gardener to-day. He cannot buy them at 10s.

or so the 1,000 bulbs, as he can poeticus, and Barrii conspicuus; consequently, he cannot naturalise them, and see them nodding in their hundreds amid the cool grass, or enlivening his borders in gay, laughing groups. But he can grow a few in a select bed, or, mayhap, in pots, and gradually increase his stock by the offsets which they form. He is doing that now, and so the time is rapidly drawing nearer when we shall see the new daffodils in the proper places for so hardy and bright a flower—the woodland, the wild garden, the grassy bank, the dell sparkling with campion and forget-me-not.

Present-Day Problems.

SCOTLAND AND THE PEERS.

[FROM A SCOTTISH CORRESPONDENT.]

It is a natural question to ask: In what mood is Scotland taking the loss of the Smallholders' Bill? If the answer were to be collected from the Unionist Press, the funnel through which the opinion of landlords, estate managers, lawyers, and farmer-capitalists pours itself, Scotland is in a state of indifference, touched with satisfaction at an escape from agrarian revolution. But the Smallholders' Bill was not designed to please the territorialists, their agents and sycophants. It is a democratic measure, if ever there was one, meant for the improvement of the farm servant, the shepherd, the villager, the humble person who labours the land, but is doomed to a stationary place in rural economy: meant also to stimulate in Scotland the system of cultivation which is yielding such remarkable results on the Continent of Europe. Search the feeling of the class thus deprived of a boon, and it is one of heavy disappointment, touched with anger. The anger is not explosive, for the Scotchman's settled conviction is that the House of Lords simply acts according to its nature; it is unregenerate and past praying for—an institution to be borne with resignedly until the day arrives for root-and-branch work. At any moment a plébiscite in Scotland would make an end of the Lords' supremacy; at this moment the country folk would have preferred even a truncated Land Bill to a full-bodied grievance against the Peers, since that makes no sensible addition to the already large sum of their iniquities.

To obtain a measure of the disappointment it must be understood that the policy of the rejected Bill had long been maturing. The idea of small holdings had taken root. People who never catch the sentiment of the field-worker, journalists who would be at a loss to distinguish mangold wurzel from turnip, politicians who eat Danish butter without knowledge of the organised small farming which places it on the breakfast table, ascribe a ridiculous mystery to the origin of the Bill. It is said to have sprung from the Scottish Secretary's inner consciousness. Such silly gibes have been flung at Mr. Sinclair as that he gained his agricultural experience in a Lancer regiment. A patrician orator of the sort that begins a humorous sentence and forgets to put the humour in has charged him with ignorance of the practice of cropping in rotation.

The truth is the Scottish land question was crying out for a statesman's hand. In all their nineteen years of power the Conservatives contributed nothing to a settlement except some minor amendments of the Crofters Act, the passage of which they had fiercely opposed—that and the formation of the Congested Districts Board. The misery of thousands of landless cottars in the Highlands and islands could not be relieved because of the Conservative objection to face up to the compulsory appropriation of land. For the same reason crofters were denied additions to their meagre holdings. An economic state affronting to civilisation was tolerated that landlord right might remain intact. Elsewhere arable soil was lapsing into pasture; deer forests were encroaching; more and more land was being added to the sacred region which a Scotchman is forbidden to walk over, to regard as in any sense his own country, though he is solicited to take up arms for its defence. Then there were the obvious facts of rural depopulation, the decay of village life, the lack of a career for farm servants, the dependence on groups of co-operative peasant farmers in Denmark for daily food—these constituted a problem which a Liberal Minister was bound to tackle as soon as he entered office. Mr. Sinclair had prepared himself. Seven or eight years ago, when he could not have dreamt of being Secretary for Scotland, he delivered a series of speeches covering the whole ground of land reform. He made himself familiar with Sir Horace Plunkett's reconstructive work in Ireland. He took a leading share in organising large parties of representative farmers and others interested in agricultural education and development, for the study of the Danish and Irish small holdings system, and the very full, able, and popularly-written reports of these expert inquirers became matter of fireside talk in every Scottish hamlet. Thus before the responsibilities of office fell to him, Mr. Sinclair had been instrumental in laying a foundation of knowledge of what small holdings might be made, and in raising the expectations that the Peers have so jauntily wrecked.

Nothing said in the House of Lords or in the Unionist Press, nothing said by associations of landlords or combinations of large farmers, shakes the faith of the majority of Scotchmen that Mr. Sinclair's plan was a masterly conception. It provided for the amendment and enlargement of the existing crofter legislation. It abandoned the attempt to make distinctions between crofters and crofters, and between crofters and smallholders—distinctions which were mere arbitrary, legal fictions set up to secure the passage of the Act of 1886 through a bitterly hostile chamber. It took advantage of existing machinery for the fixing of fair rent. It treated the subject on a national scale, applying one principle and one form of administration to all Scottish land within the rental limit. Above all, it gave security of tenure, which is the essential pre-condition of all prosperous farming. This proposed enactment of security of tenure, not the particular machinery of the Bill, was the crowning offence to the landlords. Some people do not yet understand that the question in dispute was not one of two methods of carrying out the small holdings policy, a so-called democratic county council method as against a bureaucratic method, but a question of the methods of dealing with the landlords and settling the tenant. By the county council plan the landlord received a firm rent for a stated number of years, at the end of which the lease would have been renewed or the land returned to him. He would have lain under no risks. If he pleased he might go and play golf while his property was in use. The tenant settled upon this plan became a sub-tenant of the county council, subject to removal, and the rates bore the responsibility. By Mr. Sinclair's plan the land was compulsorily hired in similar fashion, but the tenant was made sure of his holding so long as he fulfilled the legal obligations. Security of tenure was, therefore, the vital thread of Mr. Sinclair's Bill, and it was this thread the Peers were determined upon snapping, all the assertions of the merits of county councils as managing bodies being beside the case.

Now, if Scotchmen understand the value of anything in the agricultural world, it is the economical value of freedom from disturbance. The nineteen years' lease system is a concession to the principle of security of tenure, and it is matter of common knowledge that when the long lease is drawing to expiry the farmer slacks off, making less use of the possibilities of the soil because of the uncertainties of renewal. Landlords and factors change, new views and tempers come in, and the best of farmers goes through a period of wasteful unsettlement. For the success of small holdings, security of tenure is believed in Scotland to be absolutely necessary. It ensures the cultivator an inalienable homestead and a roof-tree for his old age. It calls forth his utmost energy and resourcefulness. It puts him in possession of all that is valuable in proprietorship without requiring him to sink money in a purchase price, and without the consequent temptation to hang mortgages about his neck. The small holder, as a simple tenant at will, is a man working with one hand.

All this is perfectly realised by the Scottish peasant who is not infected by the Irish passion for ownership. It is also realised by the Scottish landlords, for their opposition is animated not by dislike of a Land Court, not by any imagined fear of crofterising the whole of Scotland, not by a genuine belief in the superior ability of local electoral bodies to carry through the large land transactions, but by a determination to prevent the smallholder from being settled on a secured tenure. In the hundreds of meetings held in Scotland, meetings scarcely reported in the Press, the fact was firmly grasped that the Peers and landlords have fought for the proprietors' right to select a tenant, to control the destinies of a tenant, and, in the last resort, to turn the tenant adrift.

In Scotland, where men and matters are closely known, the expert agricultural opinion unfavourable to the Bill, so much relied upon in the House of Lords, has made no impression. Landlords and their hangers-on, a particularly articulate class, are written off at once. The minds of the large farmers unfortunately suffered a twist at the beginning of the controversy from the provision that rendered their holdings above 150 acres in extent subject to reduction. These large farmers had since been put to silence by the incorporation of the identical provision in Lord Camperdown's Bill. When their own ingenuities were strained to produce an alternative plan the result was the worthless recommendation to proceed by Government purchase. The Douglas Commission, again, is known to be an effort of enmity engineered by a jaundiced Liberal who, with the purpose of killing the Bill, took his opinions from the Lowlands to the Highlands, gave them an airing, and brought them back again. No unprejudiced person can deny that security of tenure has encouraged the statutory crofter to raise decent dwellings for himself in place of the insanitary cabins which sheltered the family and the livestock under one squalid roof, while also inciting him to make more of the inhospitable patches of soil that were all the landlords had left him of the common rights enjoyed by his predecessors under the historical clan system. On no point has more theatrical rubbish been talked than on the supposed crofterisation of the Scottish Lowlands. The argument from the crofter's case simply comes to this: immunity from the menace of eviction has wrought a substantial improvement in cultivation and housing in the six counties within the statutory crofting area; the same sense that the cultivator is independent of the caprice, the altering conditions, or necessities of a superior, the same sense that every ounce of energy put forth by the cultivator results to his own profit will bear fruit in greater measure on the fertile soils of the Lowlands.

It is a discreditable picture of inequality, grievance, frustrated objects, disappointment of personal hopes, postponement of national policy, that the Peers have left in Scotland. They cannot really be so proud of themselves as they look. To preserve the landlord's stress upon the tenant, that is, in the ultimate, the power to evict, they have ordained the continuance of wretchedness for the swarm of landless cottars and squatters on the fringes of the Western seas. In the statutory crofting area they have balked the general desire for the enlarged holdings necessary to the earning of a fair livelihood. Outside this area they have burnt a sense of injustice into the hearts of men who find themselves deprived of the benefits of the Crofters Acts because the breadth of a stream, or a fence, or the shoulder of a hill, separates them from the protected crofter. Everywhere in Scotland they expose the smallholder to the burden of a competition rent that may be double, or more than double, the rent borne by the adjacent acres of the large farmer. They have also permitted the process of absorbing small holdings to go on. These same Peers, standing upon their landlord privileges, have shown a preference for vacant country sides and deserted hamlets. The Canadian Government will applaud them as first-class emigration agents. The Danish Government will rank them high as patrons of Danish butter, eggs, and bacon. Scotland is certainly paying a high price for its territorial magnates.

But there is something on the other side of the account, and Mr. Sinclair's bold policy has accomplished more for the education of the public, aye, and of the Peers, than was possible in years of controversy over timid schemes. His Bill served as the whipping boy for the English Bill. It supplied the pressure needful for embodying in a statute the revolutionary principle of compulsory hiring and valuation. It has had the amazing effect of converting Lord Camperdown into a land reformer. It will have the further salutary effect of clearing the few remaining Unionist representatives, bag and baggage, out of the county constituencies.

Contemporaries.

"THE LADY-IN-CHIEF."

THE presentation of the Freedom of the City to Miss Florence Nightingale naturally suggested a wonder why the honour had not been bestowed before, if it was to be bestowed at all. It is not always that we can wait for more than half a century and then reward a man or woman for some deed of high distinction performed all that time ago. In the case of authors and men of science, certainly, we usually defer the reward till their reputation is "established" on the brink of the grave, but it is not on those terms that we reward our generals. And Miss Nightingale's claim to honour was as decisive and indisputable fifty years ago as any general's could be. When our grandmothers were in their prime, no name was better known than hers, no picture more familiar on cottage walls or in middle-class dining-rooms than that of the "Lady-in-Chief" going her rounds through the Barrack Hospital at Scutari; no story was more welcome to an audience than how she began her career of mercy by binding up a dog's paw. Her high and permanent place in the history of our country was fixed before most of us were born, and it came like a surprise to the young to think that she was still living among us to accept the testimony of appreciation which our City in its own good time has decided to confer.

It is long since the character and exploits of this "Queen of Nurses" almost became a myth of heroism—a beautiful story repeated and embellished for edification. The time of the Crimean War was a fruitful period for myths, and we cannot think that Miss Florence Nightingale was fortunate in the peculiar sentiment pervading the minds of those who first told her story. That she should be loved by the soldiers and glorified by the country was natural enough; hardly any love or glory could be too high for her services. But it was the tendency of the time to sentimentalise and maunder, especially about women—to picture the lady and her nurses as "The Angel Band," to sob "a ministering Angel thou!" till the effect was a little sickening. The tendency of the time produced the conception it loved, and called it by the lady's name. People liked to imagine in their heroine a gentle and pitying creature, "all conscience and tender heart," like Chaucer's Prioress, all condescension and shrinking delicacy and tears. Even the historian of the war when he wanted to speak of an Order of Nurses felt obliged to call it "the Gracious Dynasty." Genteel society was shocked beyond expression at the bare idea of any young lady desiring to be a nurse. Any bare idea shocked genteel society, and so when the shocking thing was actually realised and graciously acknowledged by Royalty, they had to drape it decently with a long white garment and a pair of swan-like wings. It was the age of crinolines, accomplishments, and fainting.

So the myth grew, because, like all myths, it was the thing people wanted. But if we look to the genuine records, if we listen to those who have known the "Lady-in-Chief," even in her long seclusion, or read the few books and other writings that she has published from time to time, if we consider the deep friendship she won from some of the clearest and least romantic minds of last century, we shall see how false is the picture that the Early Victorian Age imposed upon itself. Even Kinglake, with his revelry in sentimental eloquence, chooses "forethought, agile brain-power, the organising and governing faculty," as the special characteristics of womanhood that redeemed the hospitals of Scutari and Balaclava. "Woman," he cries in a style more like himself, "can impel, can disturb, can destroy pernicious content!" It was Miss Nightingale's practical and organising power, not her tenderness or those "droppings of warm tears," that impressed the people who really had to work with her. In the letter in which Sidney Herbert as Secretary for War invited her to go, he speaks of her as the one person he knew in England who would be capable of organising and superintending the scheme. It is her "administrative capacity and experience" upon which he dwells, and in the very next sentence he foretells the disaster of turning "a number of sentimental enthusiastic ladies" loose in the hospital, as was the danger the moment that William Russell, of the "Times," called for devoted women to minister to the sick and suffering. Alas! we still know those sentimental, enthusiastic ladies who think devotion and a uniform can make a Florence Nightingale. Was not the Mount Nelson Hotel crowded with their pretty caps?

For many years before her opportunity came, Miss Nightingale had submitted to a strict course of hospital training, and had practised nursing in quiet but varied forms. It was knowledge that gave her power when the moment called her—knowledge and persistence of will. She was probably born with a taste as well as a faculty for rule, and hidden from the public as her influence remained after the Crimea, she was able to make it deeply felt on the side of reform, both in the Army and in India. "Woman is the practical sex," says Meredith emphatically, and the words give a much truer idea of the "Lady-in-Chief" than the common picture of angelic softness. Certainly, like most serious minds of her time, she was given to religious questionings, and an introspection that may seem to most people of to-day a little over-scrupulous. But the moment it came to action, all hesitation disappeared, and nothing morbid or hysterical could exist in the same mind with a humour that sometimes reminds one of Mary Kingsley, herself a heroine of nurses. We should say the temptations of her nature were rather to despotism and impatience with fools than to tears and effeminate pity.

It is forty-eight years since her "Notes on Nursing" were published, and they should still be read for their shrewd advice, and the straight-forward sympathy that knows the right thing to say and to do for patients without fuss. But they should be read far more as a proof of the great advance made within her lifetime, not only in sick-nursing, but in the more important things of healthy life. In those days her readers evidently thought it a dangerous paradox when she insisted on the healthiness of open windows and night air. Her rules for conciseness and quick decision in dealing with the sick appeared a little cruel. But it takes us further back to read that she considered a man "a far less objectionable being in a sick-room than a woman," because, "compelled by her dress, every woman now either shuffles or waddles," and "the dress of woman is daily more and more unfitting them for any 'mission,' or usefulness at all." Or when, again, she protests against "the commonly received idea that it requires nothing but a disappointment in love, or incapacity for other things, to turn a woman into a good nurse." We remember the violent opposition she herself had to encounter when she, a member of a county family, adopted a serious profession, and one "not suitable for a woman," as all the county said. And when we think of the astonishing change which has come over the ideals and existence of womanhood within the last half-century, we see that much as our soldiers and our hospitals and nursing-homes owe to Florence Nightingale, the women of our country owe her more.

Letters to the Editor.

"THE SECOND EDUCATIONAL COMPROMISE."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The able summary of the educational position contained in your issue of February 29th presents the case for the Bill as a matter of political expediency as effectively as is possible within the limits of a leading article.

You appear, however, to regard either "consistent undenominationalism" or a "secular solution" as the only possible alternatives to compromise on the lines of the present Bill. There is, I believe, a third one.

It may be remembered that Dr. Macnamara drew public attention some twelve months ago to the system which has been in operation during the last thirty-five years in the town of Huddersfield. In the Council schools of that town the morning school is opened by a devotional service, consisting of hymn, the reading of selected passages from the Bible, and prayer. This service is religious in the best sense of the word; it has satisfied the Undenominationalists of Huddersfield ever since the School Board was formed, and none but the most bigoted Secularist, on the one hand, or Sacerdotalist, on the other, could object to it. If such a service were held in all schools, and facilities allowed in Council schools for Undenominational, and in Voluntary schools for Denominational Biblical instruction at the cost of those who desired it, the possibility would be attained of having a National Secular administration whilst allowing the desired opportunity for special religious instruction which many believe to be essential.

It is, I think, of importance at the present juncture that attention should be drawn to the economic waste caused by the effort to retain Biblical instruction in both Council and Voluntary schools—a waste which seems likely to be increased if the Bill should pass. The recent law case of the Managers of Garforth National School v. West Riding County Council affords a striking illustration of the inability of the Local Education Authority to secure efficient organisation with greater economy of staff by combining the children of the same standard from two school houses instead of maintaining a complete staff for all standards in each of the two. There are numerous big villages with two schools, each having from 100 to 150 scholars in average attendance. Under the present system these schools, if one or both be non-provided, cannot be combined, and consequently there are either two complete sets of teachers where one would suffice, or the teachers have to struggle with two or more standards in one class. This is obviously a most inefficient arrangement. The opinion is held by responsible administrators that the saving in staff and other charges of maintenance possible if the Local Education Authority could combine such schools, would pay the cost of building one modern school house to replace the existing premises, now forced upon the taxpayer, which are in such places generally ill-adapted to their purpose.

It is difficult to estimate the effect of the Bill in bringing non-provided schools under Council management or to determine whether it will reduce or increase the number of small schools.

The limitation of thirty scholars now imposed by the Bill, will close a fair number of the most costly and inefficient schools. It may be assumed that all Undenominational non-provided schools would be transferred at once. The difference between the cost of upkeep of schools with less than 100 in average attendance, which runs from about £2 10s. to £4 10s. per child, and the maximum grant of 47s., is such that the burden of raising subscriptions for such schools will not be faced. Even in respect of schools with an attendance of 100 to 200, the fact that a rate has to be paid in any case will be a powerful lever for transfer. Above 200, it seems likely that the grant will more than pay average working expenses. There is an unknown factor in the problem—the ability of the Board of Education to maintain the present efficiency. It should also be noted that at present an enormous number of Nonconformists attend non-provided schools, because, so long as there is accommodation, the Board of Education prevents building. Most of these would at once demand a free school if fees were charged.

On the other hand, the provision of the Bill that a Council school must be provided in urban districts wherever demanded—a fundamental principle of a national system—whilst permitting a non-provided school to continue alongside, under the contracting-out clause, renders possible an indefinite multiplication of small schools. At present there are many villages in urban districts served by a non-provided school which are so far from the adjoining village that such school is the only one available for the children of the village. They are, in fact, single-school areas, and it is unfortunate that the Bill has limited the compulsory transfer clause to rural districts. If such non-provided schools are able to "contract-out," and a Council school is demanded, the rate and tax payers jointly will be burdened with the building of another schoolhouse and the maintenance of two complete staffs where one has sufficed, so far as numbers are concerned.

In assessing the economic waste of this effort to continue the dual system, rendered necessary by the inclusion of Biblical instruction, two other items in the Bill must be considered—the administrative staff and the furniture, &c., placed by the Councils in non-provided schools.

Each Local Education Authority has, under the Act of 1902, created a staff sufficient to deal with all schools in their area—non-provided as well as provided. Every school which contracts-out will diminish the work of the financial and administrative officers of the authority in whose area it is. If contracting-out should be at all general, the services of a very large number of officials will be no longer required. If, as is probable, the ratepayers object to pay unnecessary salaries, the prospect is gloomy for educational officials, for whom the Bill makes no provision for compensation on loss of office or salary.

The value of the furniture and other apparatus, such as maps, reading-books, &c., placed by the Councils in non-provided schools will run to many thousands of pounds. As the Council schools are sufficiently stocked, such furniture cannot be transferred; to store it is out of the question, for good reasons. Is it to be given or sold to the contractors-out, and if so, at what price? On this question also the Bill is silent.

Contracting-out will also seriously interfere with the organisation created under the Act of 1902 for training teachers, and with that of woodwork, cookery, and swimming centres. In many cases, centres and classes for these subjects have only been made possible by the inclusion of scholars from non-provided schools, and the creation of a class of schools in respect of which the Local Education Authority will receive no grant, is bound to create great disorganisation.

The discussion upon the Bill has, so far, ranged almost exclusively round the religious question and contracting-out. It is time that more attention were given to the loss of efficiency and excessive costliness caused by the present system, which is removable only by a truly national system from which all features objectionable to any of the warring sects have been removed.—Yours, &c.,

March 10th, 1908.

L. M. B.

THE OBSTACLE TO WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—An article in last week's NATION, entitled "The Obstacle to Woman Suffrage," contains, first, an able refutation of the arguments brought against Woman's Suffrage, and, towards the end, a more or less specious plea for delay in settling the question. Women are entitled to the vote, but must not expect to get it from the present Government, is the sum and substance of the article. It is this reluctance to concede reforms admitted to be just that makes one despair of Liberalism, and will inevitably bring the Liberal Party to its ruin. Some glimmering of the fact that Liberalism is in danger seems to underlie the statement that the Suffrage is a logical consequence of recognised Liberal principles, and is bound to come in time if Liberalism survives. Woman Suffrage is certain to come, whether the Liberal Party lives or not; but how is it possible for Liberalism to survive unless the country has confidence that what the Liberals believe to be right, that they will do?

The excuses for delay in granting Woman Suffrage are, broadly speaking, three in number. The first is, it appears, that Woman Suffrage is only one among a number of causes equally just, and ("since the function of this Parliament is to prove that organic social reform is compatible with Free Trade and Liberal principles") in some cases "more pressing." A strange view of the meaning of democracy is here revealed. Organic social changes necessarily affecting women are to be carried through without the consent or advice of women. What wonder that intelligent, self-respecting women are in revolt as a consequence of such high-handed treatment, and are determined no longer to submit to be legislated for by a Parliament over which they have no control!

Let me appeal to those who shrink from action in this matter of Women's Enfranchisement to pull themselves together, and to try to realise that in asking the Government to adopt Mr. Stanger's Bill we are not making any extravagant claim on the time and energy of the legislators. If those concerned will set to work in a business-like way, the remaining stages of the measure will absorb but a few hours of the time of the House of Commons. To carry this Bill into law in the present Session, with the result that the militant Suffrage agitation will cease, must necessarily involve far less interference with the schemes of Social Reform which the Government have it in their hearts to effect than will the opposition and obstruction from women to which the continued denial of Woman Suffrage will lead.

A second excuse for withholding the suffrage is that the question was not before the electors at the General Election. For this Suffragists are certainly not to blame. They tried to induce the Government to place Woman Suffrage on the election programme, but they were unsuccessful. Their neglect at the time of the General Election to submit the question to the electors is now made, by the Party in power, an excuse for refusing to grant the vote; but women cannot allow them to plead their own previous default as a justification for their present misdeeds. Though recent bye-election results are a sign that the men voters are, as a matter of fact, supporting the women in their struggle with the Government, yet the argument that the electors must be consulted in reference to Woman Suffrage is inadmissible, because it depends upon the entirely mistaken idea that women's right to vote is derived from the consent of men. As well might it be argued that men ought not to have obtained the franchise without asking the permission of women. If Woman Suffrage was not before the electors in a concrete form at the General Election, neither was the Plural Voting Bill, the Licensing Bill, and other measures which one might name. Yet those who would deny us the vote on that ground have nothing to say against the introduction by the Government of these measures for which the electors gave no particular mandate. The true position surely is that the Liberal Party was entrusted by the country at the General Election with power to give legislative effect to Liberal principles of which the enfranchisement of women is admittedly one. The claim which suffragists are making has so often, in bygone centuries, been the subject of constitutional struggles that it certainly does not need further endorsement.

THE NATION proceeds, in the third place, to say that there is no reason for giving Woman Suffrage preference over the reform of the male electoral basis, that the two injustices stand on the same footing, and that the order in which they are redressed is a matter of convenience. It is almost incredible that it should be found possible to overlook the fact that, whereas the extension of the male franchise now involves a mere change of machinery, the enfranchisement of women means the establishment of the principle of the political equality of the sexes and the admission to citizenship of people hitherto condemned by the accident of birth to perpetual disfranchisement. On demanding the immediate enactment of a Woman Suffrage Bill, we are often assured that the time for the extension of the franchise to women will come when a general measure of electoral reform is before Parliament. Some of us, knowing that attempts to secure inclusion of women's franchise in past Reform Bills have failed, have refused to wait for the vote until the whole electoral system is under revision.

The attitude adopted in THE NATION is a proof that we are right. Our eagerness to get the vote is not to be dispelled or diminished by the prediction that our expectations in regard to the effects of Woman Suffrage may miss fulfilment. Certainly we realise that the women citizens' upward march may possibly be slow, but that is no reason for not hastening to begin it. Nor are we discouraged by the knowledge that the agricultural labourer has not yet gained as much as might have been hoped in consequence of securing the vote. We see very clearly that the vote is a weapon which, to produce its full effect, needs skilful manipulation. We think, however, that a sufficient number of women possess the necessary skill and insight to make the newly won vote a thing of great and immediate value. Those of us who are pursuing the militant campaign have acquired a stock of political experience which will stand us in good stead for the days of our enfranchisement.—Yours, &c.,

CHRISTABEL PANKHURST.

March 11th, 1908.

"VOTES FOR WOMEN AND THE LIBERAL PARTY."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—For a "Liberal Woman" to say that the Government has not a mandate for Women's Suffrage is surely for her to misunderstand the whole position.

This Government has a mandate for Liberalism which says, "Taxation without representation is tyranny. Government by the people, for the people, through the people." It cannot, therefore, need a special mandate for Woman's Suffrage, which is the embodiment of these two principles. Her other arguments, that women do not yet sufficiently desire the vote, and are unfit for it, are quite beside the mark; similar arguments were used in 1884 to Mr. Gladstone concerning agricultural labourers; he, in answer, pointed out that they were really reasons why it should be given to them.

No, what we women want to-day is—not an "effective demand" but a Government that will be true to its principles and just to the women who have done so much for the party, and if we Liberal women will stand shoulder to shoulder together, and refuse to work any longer for a party that has flouted us, a party that by its present action is showing itself unworthy of the name of Liberal we should force the Government to action, and we should be acting in the best interests of our own party, for it would be a very black day indeed for the latter should Women's Suffrage be granted by a Tory Government.—Yours, &c.,

ANOTHER LIBERAL WOMAN.

March 3rd, 1908.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—May I, as one of a number of Liberal women who do not "refuse to spend their strength for the Liberal cause until the legitimate, recognised, effectual instrument for work—the vote—be granted to them," say a word in defence of our action, and of our refusal to be coerced by other women into working for a measure of enfranchisement that will not satisfy us either as Liberals or as women?

For us Liberalism is no mere party label to be worn at election times for the sake of some individual candidate. It is a Cause, a Flag, a Faith. For it we are ready to "do or die," and we could not dream of forsaking it in order to drive our leaders into carrying out a measure which, however just in principle, would not, in its limited form, make for the general progress of the nation as some believe.

Let us imagine that a battle was raging between Christians and Mohammedans, in which the latter were to all appearance gaining ground, to the utter destruction of the Christian religion. What should we say to any body of Christians who, when the fight was hottest, chose to produce an ultimatum demanding Disestablishment of the Church, threatening to go over to or give direct aid to the hostile invader if their demands were not instantly granted? Would they be able to persuade any one of their sincerity as Christians? Would their argument be listened to (used similarly by the Suffragettes), that the victory of Mohammedanism in that case would not lie at the door of those who had acted as traitors, but of the bishops or other authorities who had refused their demands?

The illustration serves to explain why, fortunately for England, the bulk of Liberal women are keeping the faith, are realising that never before in the history of our country has the need been greater for loyalty and unity, and never has the urgency of the franchise been less than to-day, when we are face to face with the twin giant foes of Protection and Militarism, and when, moreover, the forces of Progress have at last a chance of success. Tariff Reform is no innocent rearrangement of taxes which could be changed as often as possible, and which, while being worth the lavish expenditure upon its propaganda of thousands of pounds, is yet said to be quite harmless, and really not likely to touch the people at all. Do people nowadays spend lavishly without hope of regaining, with interest, what they have poured out? Can anyone travel in body or mind in America and remain blind and indifferent to the hideous result on the people of a sovereignty of wealth and greed? "Fear not him who is able to kill the body, but rather fear him who is able to kill both body and soul." England's soul is in danger, for it is threatened with Protection—the weapon of Greed and Selfishness. Therefore it is in defence of England's soul that women are exhorted to rally round the flag and realise the country's urgent need for loyal citizens.

Your correspondent, Kate Hessel, falls into the common error of supposing that the vote will be exercised only by those women who will "heartily and intelligently throw themselves into the work of social and political reform." If this could be either proved or effected, no Liberal Government could withstand the demand for the vote; but surely if one thing is more certain than another, it is that women, like men, will vote according to the measure of their development. An enormous majority (on the property qualification) would naturally vote Conservative. The Women's Tariff Reform League boasts of more members than the Women's Free Trade Union to-day, the local Primrose Leagues than the Liberal Associations; at the time of the war a "Pro-Boer" woman of property hardly existed. Hundreds of women are now working actively for the forces of reaction behind the "Lords" and the "Trade." How, then, is the vote going to perform the alleged miracle, and convert all the wealthy middle-class reactionary women into "heartily and intelligent reformers"? As a matter of fact, it will do nothing of the kind. A limited franchise will make little or no difference in the general warfare of the nation. In those States of America where women do vote, there is absolutely no less political corruption or general evil doing. In those Colonies where they also vote, and where, be it remembered, the men also are immensely progressive, the women are both for and against certain measures of reform. Women cannot by the vote divest themselves of their human nature, and that will always remain inconsistent, uncertain, and generally imperfect in both sexes. Meanwhile, may I very earnestly plead with all Liberal women to stand loyally by their flag, and not be led away into lower paths of political morality, nor of substituting expediency for principle at a time when, of all others, the country needs their patriotism? If Mr. Ramsay Macdonald views the return of the Opposition to power with "terror," ought not we women to look at the Suffrage question with different eyes, and vow that never by any action of ours "Britons shall be slaves" to the greed and selfishness of a class tyranny such as we should get under Protection and Toryism?—Yours, &c.,

ANOTHER "WOMAN LIBERAL."

March 16th, 1908.

THE NEW BOTANY.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I have for many years been interested in the natural association of plants, and I think that, if a more definite knowledge of the subject could be attained, it might be of practical use in the cultivation of our fruit trees. Take, for example, an orchard: it is quite unnatural that so many apple trees should be growing together on a limited space of ground, all drawing the same nourishment from the soil. Now, if it could be discovered what plants there are that thrive in company with apple trees and mutually benefit each other, and if such plants were to be put into the ground of orchards, it would undoubtedly be the surest way of keeping our apple trees healthy and free of insect pests. Such a knowledge can only be attained either by a study of the natural association of plants or by experimental gardening.—Yours, &c.,

IDA SHARP.

March 17th, 1908.

ARE ARMAMENTS NECESSARY?

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In a recent issue of your valuable journal there occurred the following passage: "That a man shall reap as he has sown, that to-morrow will be as yesterday, that inevitable law shall bind and control the revolt of human passion against circumstance; these are the affirmations of moralist and philosopher against which the romantic spirit is in continual rebellion."

I write now to suggest that you should open your columns to a discussion on the secret of the inevitable law that we have crystallised in the phrase "the survival of the fittest."

Does this imply the survival of the most combatant and highly self-protected or of the most useful to the race?

In the vegetable world it is not the brambles, nettles, and thistles that have survived, but the wheat and fruitful crops. In the animal world the utility of the dog, the horse, the cow, and the sheep has proved a greater element of defence to its species than have the teeth and claws of the lion, tiger, and leopard; and if one reviews the history of nations and civilisations, the same inevitable law is visible in forceful operation. The Greek and Roman civilisations flourished so long as they were useful to the progress of humanity. The economic and moral inutility of a civilisation based on the slavery of the greater portion of the population was the ultimate cause of the decay of each. Sovereignty, nobility, the Church, each and every time-honoured institution, seems safe only so long as they remain adapted to our progressive civilisation, doomed no sooner than they fail to comply with such test. If, then, utility be the secret ultimately of self-protection, it can only be the romantic spirit referred to in the above quotation from your columns "in its continual rebellion against the affirmations" of experience that concentrates all our attention on the maintenance of a special standard of physical force, regardless of any sacrifice that such policy entails on the more essential factor of the utility of our Empire, as an economic and moral force to humanity at large.

If the laws that govern human affairs are indeed inevitable and unchangeable, and if utility be the secret of the stability of all human institutions, it must manifestly be quite futile to appeal ultimately to some other standard of safety that would appear to diminish our compliance with this, the most important factor.

Our armaments cost the country upwards of sixty millions sterling annually; but even thus the stability of this immense force is dependent on the general recognition that our object is defence, and not aggression.

What would be our position if we avowedly relied for our safety solely on the inevitable law of our utility, and diverted the immense sum of money at present employed in armaments for the purpose of rendering our Empire, both morally and economically, more useful?

Is it reasonable to suppose that such a policy would be a signal to our neighbours to attack and extinguish us?

To what extent would this immense sum saved from unproductive expenditure increase our economic utility?

What would be the moral force of such an example? If economically and morally sound, would not such action compel almost immediate imitation? There are matters in relation to Imperial defence closely associated with the inevitable law of the survival of the fittest, the elucidation of which seems hardly to have received adequate consideration.

So long as we accept force as the only standard of our safety, the increased burden of our armaments seems to be an inevitable corollary. Is force indeed the inevitable law of nature, or merely the pronouncements of the romantic spirit in its continued rebellion against the affirmations of all experience?—Yours, &c.,

A. R.

March 16th, 1908.

MOROCCO.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I was pleased to see that THE NATION of last week is of the opinion that the time has come for our Foreign Office to give some friendly advice to the French Government on the subject of Morocco.

It is absurd for M. Pichou to state in the French Chamber that Mulai Hafid is a rebel. The Tangier "Times" Correspondent, who is, perhaps, better informed on Moroccan affairs than any European, and certainly in a better position to speak with authority than M. Pichou, writes to his paper: "Abdul Aziz, in spite of many reports to the contrary, is steadily losing ground, or perhaps it is more correct to say that the Moorish people scarcely consider him any longer as a factor in the situation." As regards Mulai Hafid's reported hostility to France, it is as well to recall his own words: "We are ready to be the friends of France, but not her slaves." My own experience of travelling in Morocco is that if you respect the feelings of the people, they respect you.—Yours, &c.,

DOUGLAS FOX PITT.

War Coppice, Caterham, Surrey,
March 12th, 1908.

"THE RICH MAN'S DILEMMA."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Your article under this heading reminds me of a recent heresy of my own. It was suggested in my last published book, which, I think, did not reach you. The heresy is that poverty is the cause, and not the effect, of what may be deemed excessive luxury. What, then, is poverty? I cannot gauge it by pounds, shillings, and pence, and I do not believe anybody else can. It seems to be an insufficient supply of those material commodities which are essential for human life and comfort—food, clothing, shelter, and the rest. And I cannot regard a supply in the hands of producers and traders as sufficient if the prices render it inaccessible to those who need it. Nor is it "quite clear" to me "that the volume of employment, both for capital and labour, must be greatly reduced" by the saving and consequent use of more money "to furnish increased or improved plant and raw materials to industry." Will you allow the writer of your article kindly to explain? Such a condition might conceivably lead to over-production. But I strongly advocate over-production. By that means it seems possible that the prices would bring the goods within reach of a wider circle and a poorer class. It would be so much towards the alleviation of poverty. The increased demand for commodities would result in an increased demand for the means of producing them, including labour. And thus the spiral would continue the improvement. All this is, of course, rank heresy, and I do not expect anybody to take notice of it—in this generation.

Meantime, you are heroically seeking a solution of the problem of poverty and other social problems on altogether different lines, based on a quite contrary view. But I am bound to say you do not appear to be making much headway. Possibly I have "fuddled my intelligence with the delusions of J. S. Mills's wage fund." For the first economic daylight I saw was that an abundant wages fund of commodities actually available to human beings needing the means of life must be good for the people, whatever its effect on money wages. It was only another step in the same direction to believe that great need, and not great abundance, was what made workers offer their services for lower money reward—which is my heresy, as before mentioned. For the great need or poverty brings the mass of the people to minister to the luxury of the rich, who have purchasing power, as a means of obtaining some scant supply of the commodities of which there is so much fear of over-production. Holding the heresy that we suffer from under-production, and not over-production or under-consumption (and without questioning your conclusion as to the remedy which is not in its terms inconsistent with my own), I beg to remark that taxes under the "equitable system of taxation" to be efficacious, for good must be assessed directly on ownership of the only original source of production—the land of the country which alone belongs to the people—and must not be increased, because the owner or any other person occupies and uses it. To assess taxation on use and occupation or on the income resulting from use and occupation or the commodities to be consumed will inevitably reduce the production. Perhaps I am wrong in thinking that reducing the production must reduce the possibility of consumption by the poor. But I do think it.—Yours, &c.,

F. N. LAYCOCK.

Sheffield, March 16th, 1908.

[Mr. Laycock opens up too many points of economic controversy for effective discussion within the limits of a note. I can only make these few and, I fear, of necessity, dogmatic comments on his letter. Over-production, attended by a general fall of prices, including the price of labour power, does not, in fact, produce the quick, automatic remedy which he thinks it should produce. I agree that need furnishes a large supply of labour for the luxury trades, but my argument was that a mere transfer on the part of the luxurious classes from demand for luxuries to demand for more machinery of production would not maintain a larger volume of employment. For the main problem of unemployment is the problem of the simultaneous employment of capital and labour in general industry during long periods of depressed trade. Land is not "the only original source of production" in a modern society, and economic rents of land are not the sole basis of "an equitable system of taxation."—The Writer of the Article.]

The Editor would be obliged if the writer of the article entitled "The New Botany," which appeared in THE NATION of February 29th, would send his name and address to the Manager.

Poetry.

BALLADE OF THE WORLD IN SHADOW.

DEAD are the gods that our fathers knew,
Less than the least of their charioteers,
One with the Titans they overthrew.
Borne on the wind of the faithless years
As the blown dust of a people's fears
Are the strown fires of their wisdom's breath;
Mocking with laughter its saints and seers,
The mad world sweeps through the dark to death.

Keeping course through the endless blue,
Blind with sorrow and spent with jeers,
The old world swings through the worlds made new.
Fond and vain are the pomps man rears,
All his life is a wind that veers—
Time the old in his wisdom saith—
Dust lies light on your dancing peers,
The mad world sweeps through the dark to death.

Rose-time fades to the time of rue,
Love is a vessel that no man steers,
Now, ere the singers be faint and few,
Mouthing dumbly, with deafened ears,
Sing, make merry, and kiss your dears:
For the world is weary, and hasteneth,
Down the shadow no dawn-star clears,
The mad world sweeps through the dark to death.

L'ENVOI.

Rust-red halberds and broken spears,
Prince, they are spoil for Astoreth,
She is the last lover each man hears,
The mad world sweeps through the dark to death.

ETHEL TALBOT.

The World of Books.

THURSDAY NIGHT.

A BOOK of great interest, which will soon be published simultaneously in England, Russia, France, Germany, and Italy, is "My Relations with Tolstoy and His Work as a Writer," by Countess Leo Tolstoy, the wife of the great Russian author. Madame Tolstoy has always acted as her husband's literary adviser and helper, and he declares that on many occasions her counsel—that of a very well balanced and also benevolent nature—was of the greatest value. The book will, therefore, be the first authorised biography of the greatest of our living writers and teachers. It is a good augury that the task will be undertaken by one placed in so favourable a position for performing it to advantage, and who combines keen and affectionate sympathy with intimate knowledge and excellent discernment.

* * *

THE news that Mr. G. Lowes Dickinson has just completed a new book will be welcomed by all who care for the finer qualities of contemporary English literature. Mr. Dickinson has already shown a remarkable gift of bringing the vital elements in classical thought to bear upon the political and social problems of our own day, and his mode of expression is a style of rare distinction and measure. We understand that the coming volume is in the form of a Platonic dialogue, and that its probable title will be "Justice and Liberty." Mr. Dickinson has been chosen to give the Ingersoll lecture at Harvard in the spring of next year. The lecture is always on the subject of immortality, and among recent lecturers have been Professors James, Royce, and Osler.

* * *

"THE STORY OF MY LIFE," by Miss Ellen Terry, is included in Messrs. Hutchinson's spring announcements. The record of Miss Ellen Terry's life should prove an attractive volume, since there is no English actress who has come in contact with so many people of eminence in art and literature as well as in the drama. A feature of great interest will be the illustrations, selected from Miss Terry's famous collection of portraits. Among them are photographs and drawings of the great actress from her earliest appearance in public to the present day, and portraits of many men and women with whom she has associated—a list that includes a great number of the celebrities of the latter half of the nineteenth century.

* * *

THE series of annotated editions of the chief masterpieces of English literary criticism issued by the Oxford University Press has already given us several useful and scholarly volumes. The next addition to the series will be "Critical Essays of the Seventeenth Century," edited by Professor Springarn, of Columbia University. The aim of the editor has been to collect all the material (except the writings of Dryden, which have been admirably edited by Professor W. P. Ker), necessary for a thorough study of the development of English criticism in the seventeenth century, and to furnish such notes as will make this development easily intelligible. The period is one of great interest in the history of criticism. The traditions of Elizabethan culture as expressed by Sidney underwent a twofold development. On the one hand, there is Bacon, who, although he touches the subject of criticism but lightly, gave it a scientific and historical bias which succeeding writers carried still further. Ben Jonson, with his classical training and reverence for Italian literature, helped to fix the interest on the external and objective sides of literary art. Both these tendencies were taken up by Dryden and the many lesser men who preceded Addison and Johnson. The essays selected by Professor Springarn show how this process was worked out. Amongst the authors represented in his volumes are Bacon, Ben Jonson, Webster, Chapman, Drayton, Suckling, Hobbes, Davenant, Cowley, Shadwell, Rochester, Mulgrave, Roscommon, Evelyn, and many others who reflect the progress of criticism during the period.

* * *

MRS. ROSA NEWMARCH'S book, "Tchaikovsky, His Life and Works, with Extracts from His Writings," ran out of print directly after its first appearance, some years ago. A new edition has now been prepared by Messrs. Reeves, for which Mr. Edward Evans has written a series of essays upon Tchaikovsky's Instrumentation, Form, Idealism, Individuality, &c., as well as analyses of the most characteristic pieces. The new matter forms one half of the whole book, and should prove a useful help to the understanding of what is specially distinctive in Tchaikovsky's music.

* * *

THE recent discovery of a manuscript volume of 552 pages in Luther's handwriting has caused a considerable stir among scholars. The manuscript was found in the library of the late Prince Lwoff, a Russian collector of rare books. It consists of a number of theological treatises written in Latin, with a few notes in German on the last pages. The manuscript is almost certainly genuine, since it bears the seal of Wilhelm Gmelin, whose father-in-law, Johann Karg, was given the volume by Wolfgang Meusslin. Meusslin is known to have received a package of Luther's writings from a friend, and it is probable that the recently discovered manuscript was in this package. The volume consists of Biblical studies, which might well have been written by Luther before 1517, when he nailed his theses on the church door at Wittenberg.

* * *

THE fine library of the late Bishop of Truro will be sold at Sotheby's on Friday and Saturday. Most of the Shakespeare quartos have been sold privately, but there still remain some exceedingly rare books, including a splendid set of the first four folios of Shakespeare, the third having the rare imprint of 1663. The copy of Caxton's "Golden Legend" is the only known example in perfect condition. The collection is rich in early printed Bibles and Liturgies, and there is a unique copy of Pars Hyemalis of the Paris Breviary of 1533. A set of "The Original London Post," a newspaper published during the reign of George I., is certain to cause a keen competition, since it is believed to be the only set of this publication in existence.

* * *

AN important work on "The Edinburgh Periodical Press," by Mr. W. J. Couper, will be issued about the end of April by Mr. Eneas Mackay of Stirling. Mr. Couper has spent many years in collecting information on the subject, and has made researches in almost every public library of standing in England and Scotland as well as in a multitude of private libraries. The first part of the book deals with such topics as the methods of newspaper production and the distribution of periodicals during the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, the Press censorship, the Town Council as Press censors, the Scottish essay-journal, and the Edinburgh Society of Running Stationers. In the second part there will be a chronological record of all Edinburgh journals down to the beginning of the nineteenth century, facts about their policies, editors, contributors, &c., and a large amount of material bearing on Edinburgh printing in general.

* * *

BOOKS TO BE READ:—

"Letters from the Raven: Being the Correspondence of Lafcadio Hearn with Henry Watkin." With Introduction and critical comment by Milton Brouner. (Constable. 5s. net.)

"The Admiralty of the Atlantic." By P. A. Hislam. (Longmans. 6s. 6d. net.)

"Catherine of Bragança, Infanta of Portugal and Queen Consort of England." By L. C. Campbell. (Murray. 15s. net.)

"Parerga: A Companion Volume to 'Under the Cedars and the Stars.'" By Canon Sheehan, D.D. (Longmans. 7s. 6d. net.)

"Mozart: The Story of His Life as Man and Artist." By Victor Wilder. Translated by L. Liebach. (Reeves. 2 vols. 10s. net.)

"The Riddle of the Bacchæ: The Last Stage of Euripides' Religious Views." By Gilbert Norwood. (Sheratt & Hughes.)

"An Apostle of the North: Memoirs of Bishop Bompas." By H. A. Cody. (Seeley. 7s. 6d. net.)

"The Human Boy Again." By Eden Phillpotts. (Chapman & Hall. 6s.)

"Travail et Travailleurs." Par A. Millerand. (Paris: Fasquelle. 3fr. 50.)

"Petites Villes d'Italie," II. "Emile-Marches-Ombre." Par André Maurel. (Paris: Hachette. 3fr. 50.)

"L'Évolution des Sciences." Par L. Houllévigüe. (Paris: Colin. 3fr. 50.)

"L'Amour qui pleure." Roman. Par Marcelle Tinayre. (Paris: Calmann-Lévy, 3fr. 50.)

"Die Regenverteilung in den deutschen Kolonien." Von R. Fitzner. (Berlin: Paetel. M44)

Reviews.

A WHITED SEPULCHRE.*

THE witty authors of the "Hustlers' History" are entitled to our sympathies. They shot their bolt before the real quarry came in view, before the purveyors of the "Times" endeavoured to eclipse their previous records by offering to the public, for some ten guineas, the "Historians' History of the World." The title is not entirely satisfactory. There was once a meritorious venture called "The Penny Cyclopædia," and the Tories called Cobbett's "Register" "twopenny trash"; but there were still some titles left which might have suited, and we feel sure that the proprietors cannot have adequately realised the merits of "The Twopenny-halfpenny Cyclopædia" as a description of the contents of these volumes.

Only time and use will teach purchasers the real worth of productions like this. Experience has led the public to value a recent edition of an encyclopædia, which was even more extensively advertised than this history, at (approximately) as many shillings as the pounds for which it was sold. But before purchase the buyer has to rely on advertisements and reviews. One hardly expects an advertisement to tell the truth, and reviewers find it difficult. When a paper depends upon its advertisements, it tries to avoid offending the advertiser, and the lavish advertisement of these cyclopædias acts as a bribe to silence criticism. Some book-buyers, however, and most intelligent readers prefer an independent judgment to advertising puffs, and it may be worth while examining for a few minutes the claims of this compilation to be a compendium of up-to-date historical scholarship.

An imposing array of names decks out the title-page, and is designed to convey the impression that they guarantee the accuracy of the contents of these volumes. That impression is at variance with the fact. These eminent scholars have been induced to write a few pages each by way of introduction to the various sections, but their contributions are an inconsiderable proportion of the whole work, and the bulk of it consists of cuttings from third-rate text-books and antiquated writers selected without judgment and bound together in a loose, disjointed fashion by editorial rubble. The compilers, lacking independent knowledge of the topics with which they deal, are unable to speak authoritatively, and are thus driven to the expedient of counting the heads of modern writers instead of consulting original sources; and of these writers few are entitled to vote. Even when a respectable authority is cited, he is jostled on either side by sciolists, and the real historians are quoted as often on questions of which they had no special knowledge as on questions which they made their own. Take the late S. R. Gardiner, for instance. No one knew the first half of the seventeenth century as he did, and a compilation of this character might justifiably make extensive excerpts from his monumental history of that period. But he would have been the first to ridicule the idea of quoting his little school books as authorities on the early history of England or the sixteenth century. Yet no small portion of these school books is incorporated in these volumes.

Gardiner, however, was a trained historian, and, compared with many of the writers herein cited, he was a specialist even on the Anglo-Saxons. For instance, the first authority quoted on the character of Henry VIII. is Thomas Keightley. This gentleman was a prolific writer, who claimed to have written the best history of Rome in any language, and to have been the first to value at their proper worth both Virgil and Sallust! Such knowledge as he had of Henry VIII. was based upon a perusal of Lingard's "History." Other "authorities" on this subject are Charles Macfarlane, Thomas Thomson, and Charles Knight. Macfarlane was the author of a score of novels and historical compilations, of the feeblest sort, and Thomson was another literary hack. Dozens of writers of this calibre are solemnly cited as authorities on ancient, mediæval and modern history; and after pages upon pages of trash like this it is almost refreshing to find Hume quoted as an authority on the Tudors, although a little book like Griffet's "Nouveaux Eclaircissements sur l'Histoire de Marie reine d'Angleterre," published in 1766, shows how inadequately Hume availed himself of the original sources which were accessible a century and a half ago. The futility of the whole thing consists in the fact that all these writers wrote long before the publication of the materials upon which all sound criticism of the period must rest. For half a century scores of scholars have been labouring at the publication of calendars of letters, State papers, and other original documents. So far as this pretentious compilation is concerned, their labours and the sums voted by Parliament for the purposes have been wasted; there might as well have been no Record Office publications, no Rolls Series, no Dictionary of National Biography, no Cambridge Modern History.

Occasionally the compilers have lit upon what they call an original authority. One such is the Spanish Chronicle of Henry VIII., which they quote as an authority on the details of Anne Boleyn's case, remarking that "much light has been thrown on the subject" by the discovery of this book. It has indeed. And part of this new "light" is the information that Cromwell took part in the proceedings against Catherine Howard, three years after his death (making a speech which the chronicler reports), and that Henry VIII. married Catherine Howard before he married Anne of Cleves. It requires the editor to equal this, and he does it in a note (Vol. xix., p. 192), where he considers the possibility of improper relations between Lord Seymour and the Princess Elizabeth "when she was eighteen years old," by which time the unfortunate Seymour had been dead three years. Another enlightening footnote (xix., 196) informs us that the Litany of 1544 was "the basis of the late Book of Common Prayer"!

Wherever we turn we find the same tale of reliance upon discredited authorities and ignorance of modern research. The compilers know as little of M. Aulard's work on the French Revolution and Mr. Fisher's on Napoleon as they do of Professor Maitland's and Mr. Round's on the feudal ages. The old errors about Domesday and Magna Carta are all repeated. Holinshed is regarded as an authority on the Norman Conquest, and the criticism of a generation of scholars upon the "Teutonic" view of early English history is ignored. So, of course, are the vast productions of the hundreds of historical commissions in Germany, Austria, France, Italy, Spain, and elsewhere. There is hardly a page of history which has not to be rewritten in the light of these researches, and a cyclopædia which incorporated their results would be a real boon to historians. But this compilation is largely a paste and scissors collection of cuttings from works which have long disappeared from the market as damaged goods. If there is an exploded theory it will here be quoted as sound; if there is a book which is out of date it will here be dressed up as the latest authority. The compilers have scavenged in all the dustheaps of history. It is only on its advertisement side that the venture is strong. Investors who have learnt no lesson from past experience are not entitled to sympathy; but a word of commiseration may be spared for the scholars who have suffered themselves unwittingly to be dragged into this company, and have been induced by their meagre contributions to provide a coating of whitewash for this sepulchre of dead reputations and dissolving historical views.

A. F. POLLARD.

A STUDY IN THE HALF SINCERE.*

THE voice of sorrow is always full of significance, whether the note be one of pure regret, or whether it be mixed with shame, physical pain and discomfort, and, worst sting of all, with the remembrance of what might have been and can be no more. Mr. Oscar Wilde's "De Profundis" is such a voice, and with the same writer's "Ballad of Reading Gaol" is an expression of anguish endured by an unusually sensitive nature, made to suffer almost everything, short of physical torture, that man, with a good or an evil end, can

* "The Historians' History of the World," 24 volumes. "The Times" Office.

* "The Collected Works of Oscar Wilde." Limited Edition. Methuen & Co. 12s. 6d. net each volume.

inflict on his fellows. Neither work is quite original or quite sincere; both are as original and as sincere as it was in Wilde's nature to be. Both, again, are extremely eloquent, and there are, in particular, passages in the "De Profundis" so beautifully written, so musical and so melancholy, that it is hard to imagine a more delicate and yet unforced usage of the English tongue, even at the hands of its greatest masters.

In the present sumptuous edition of Mr. Wilde's works which lies before us some passages excluded from the earlier edition of "De Profundis" have been added to the text. They have no great artistic worth, but they do something to fix the moral value of the entire work. They show that this man of genius without character set himself too high in the world of art and letters. In "that beautiful unreal world," as he called it, he imagined himself "a king." He thought that he had "altered the minds of men and the colour of things," that he had taken the drama, "made it as personal a mode of expression as the lyric or sonnet," and at the same time "widened its range and enriched its characterisation," that he had "awakened the imagination of his century," and "summed up all systems in a phrase and all existence in an epigram." He compares himself with Byron, who shook a world where he influenced a coterie, owning slight affinity with the large, general movement of thought and feeling.

We must take this pathetic egoism for what it is worth. As a creative artist, in spite of his wit and feeling, his intimate sense of beauty, and his gift of style, Wilde was as inferior to contemporaries or predecessors of the æsthetic school like Ruskin, Burne-Jones, and William Morris as he was lacking in the power of discipline and self-control, the capacity for prolonged, consecutive labour, which test the character and determine the achievement of the art-worker of all ages. In long intervals of his life, which preceded its disastrous close, he was, as he confesses, "a flâneur, a dandy, and a man of fashion," surrounding himself with smaller natures and meaner minds until he declined to the base. His contributions to the drama were full of wit and artifice; but, with the exception of the beautiful dramatic poem, "Salomé," they added nothing to its forms, and, in a period of abundant and varied growth, were singularly bare both of ideas and of characters. His poetic gift was much rarer, and it displayed itself even less freely in verse than in the rich and melancholy cadence of this astonishing prose-poem, written in the prison cell, where each sight and sound repelled his fastidious sense, and brought back to him the irrevocable horror of his fall. It says something for the persistence of the artistic spirit that he could write so wonderfully, even when one cannot be sure that he was quite capable of the emotion he seemed to express. Yet it cannot with fairness be said that "De Profundis" is a mere pose, or that the touching recourse of this weak and much erring man to the speech and personality of Jesus was not a veritable impulse of the heart. For, strange as it may seem, many saints of the Christian Church have written less feelingly of its Founder and his spirit than Mr. Oscar Wilde has written. His "De Profundis" professes to trace a slow dawn of light in the soul, a dim recovery from despair and hatred of his kind—the hatred which turns prisoners' hearts to stone. The end was not destined to be achieved; the human material was probably too slight to attain a purpose that could fairly be called heroic. He remained, as he said, "antinomian"; reason, morals, everyday religion, did not appeal to him. But in this unfulfilled pilgrimage Wilde fell upon the study of the four Gospels, and found that they opened to him the other side—not "the sunlit side"—of the garden of life, and yet satisfied his æsthetic consciousness. He found in Christ the image of artistic perfection. "The very basis of his nature was the same as that of the nature of the artist—an intense and flame-like imagination." He wanted sympathy, and he found it. Christ's "morality is all sympathy—just what morality should be." "His justice is all poetical justice—exactly what justice should be." "For him there were no laws; there were exceptions merely." "There were Christians before Christ," he said, wittily. . . . "The unfortunate thing is that there have been none since"—except St. Francis. "He does not really teach one anything, but by being brought into his presence, one becomes something."

"His miracles seem to me to be as exquisite as the coming of Spring, and quite as natural. I see no difficulty in believing that such was the charm of his personality, that his mere presence could bring peace to souls in anguish, and that those who touched his garments or his hands forgot their pain; or that as he passed by on the highway of life people who had seen nothing of life's mystery saw it clearly, and others who had been deaf to every voice but that of pleasure heard for the first time the voice of love and found it as 'musical as Apollo's lute'; or that evil passions fled at his approach, and men whose dull unimaginative lives had been but a mode of death rose as it were from the grave when he called them; or that when he taught on the hillside the multitude forgot their hunger and thirst and the cares of this world, and that to his friends who listened to him as he sat at meat the coarse food seemed delicate, and the water had the taste of good wine, and the whole house became full of the odour and sweetness of nard."

Beyond this touching sentimentalism, close to the attitude of the adoring saint, and yet divided from it by a certain self-conscious fastidiousness of feeling and expression, and an inevitable want of moral integrity and simplicity, Oscar Wilde did not go. He looked vaguely for the fortification of his spirit, not so much to Christianity, as to the healing processes of Nature:—

"Society, as we have constituted it, will have no place for me, has none to offer; but Nature, whose sweet rains fall on unjust and just alike, will have clefts in the rocks where I may hide, and secret valleys in whose silence I may weep undisturbed. She will hang the night with stars so that I may walk abroad in the darkness without stumbling, and send the wind over my footprints so that none may track me to my hurt; she will cleanse me in great waters, and with bitter herbs make me whole."

But Nature could not heal him, for he could not heal himself; he desired rather to be wept over and consoled. To so sick a soul the mighty Mother could only say, "Iusisti satis," and open to him the way of release.

CRITICS FOR SOCIALISM.

I.—MR. H. G. WELLS.*

"ONE word is too often profaned," Mr. Wells might exclaim, "for me to profane it." Socialism, in the popular tumult of a growing Labour party, and the fear of it, has become the centre or rallying point of every kind of imbecile controversy. The author here desires, in plain fashion, to state his point of view: the criticism of present economic conditions, the great hope for some indefinite future, the appeal for effort in order that this hope may be realised. The book is the work of a mind extraordinarily receptive, agile, and inventive, expressing itself through a style of pliancy and strength. The habitual position is here completely reversed. The ordinary Socialist writer has many graces and qualities, but humour is not habitually one of them. He constructs his somewhat stiff picture of a reconstructed world, which is immediately assailed with every weapon of cynicism and ridicule by those who find no difficulty in annihilating a Bellamy "Utopia" or a Morris "Nowhere." Zola, once attacked for lack of laughter in his novels, replied, with some dignity, that an early youth spent in perpetual starvation amid obscurity or obloquy was not helpful to the cultivation of a sense of humour. And the Socialists who shriek and protest at street corners against the accepted order are much in the same position, and could offer much the same apology. Mr. Wells, after some experience of the struggle for existence amongst the lower middle classes, has escaped above it all, with a secure international reputation and a name which is itself an asset to any cause. He can, in consequence, turn with ease and dexterity the weapons of ridicule and biting criticism against the opponents of Socialism. The suggested impossibility of the Socialist future dwindles before the actual impossibility of the individualistic present.

This polemic is, therefore, in the best sense of the word, popular. It is written with a zest and sparkle and apparent delight in the work of impalement and dissection. The accepted jargon of "Surplus Value," "Labour unit," "the nationalisation of all the means of production," "the Social organism," is abandoned in favour of swift and rapid onslaughts upon the critics of Socialism and the advocates of the accepted order. The intellect may revolt against the prophecy of the future: the imagination is stimulated and diverted by the diagnosis of the present.

* "New Worlds for Old." By H. G. Wells. Constable & Co. 6s.

You may praise, for example, the glories of individualistic development; and Mr. Wells takes you to the South-Eastern Railway, engaged in its congenial work of strangling the enterprises and industries of the fairest of England's counties. The most violent anti-Socialist who lives in Kent will call this writer blessed for his vivacious impeachment of "a combine of two ill-managed and unenterprising railway companies, with no funds for new developments, grinding out an uncertain dividend by clipping expenditure." "A whole rich county now stagnates under the grip of this sample of private enterprise, towns fail to grow, trade flows sluggishly from point to point. No population in the world would stand such a management as it endures at the hands of the South-Eastern Railway from any responsible public body. Out would go the whole board of managers at the next election." Tell him, again, that the middle classes stand to lose by Socialism, and he will show you the middle classes "standing to lose" at present; in the picture, quick and vivid, and at once ludicrous and pitiful, of the small competing tradesman shambling to his inevitable ruin. Of a street in Sandgate he writes:—"I should say between a quarter and a third of the shops are such downward channels from decency to despair: they are sanctioned, inevitable citizen breakers." "This perpetual procession of bankruptcies has made me lately shun that pleasant-looking street, that in my unthinking days I walked through cheerfully enough. The doomed victims have a way of coming to the doors at first and looking out politely and hopefully." As might be expected in the work of a great novelist, all theories and hypotheses become transmuted into concrete illustration. Academic, uncompromising Marxian Socialism thus appears—in a biting piece of description—as "the dusky largeness of a great meeting at the Queen's Hall," with the back of Mr. Hyndman's head moving quickly, and the place "thick but by no means overcrowded with dingy, earnest people," and in the chair "Lady Warwick, that remarkable intruder into the class conflict, a blonde lady, rather expensively dressed, so far as I could judge, about which the atmosphere of class consciousness seemed to thicken." The impression was of "the gathering of village tradespeople about the lady patroness. And at the end of the proceedings, after the red flag had been waved, after the 'Red Flag' had been sung by the choir and damply echoed by the audience, someone moved a vote of thanks to the Countess, in terms of familiar respect that completed the illusion."

There is no mere gush or enthusiasm here, and the man who, despite so restless and critical a mind, can yet preach the Socialistic ideal as the way to better things, cannot be accused of coming to its advocacy in sentimental or vague pity. Even the Fabian Society, with whose policy Mr. Wells is, on the whole, in agreement, does not altogether escape; incarnate (as he finds it) in a "small, active unpretending figure with the finely-shaped head, the little imperial under the lip, the glasses, the slightly lisping, insinuating voice." Yet here, also, there arise "Webbites to caricature Webb" with excessive bureaucratic notions, and a belief that everything can be done without anyone wishing to do it; the disciple "who dreams of the most foxy and wonderful digging by means of box-lids, table-spoons, dish-covers—anything but spades designed and made for the jobs in hand—just as he dreams of an extensive expropriation of landlords by a legislature that includes the present unreformed House of Lords."

"New Worlds for Old" thus stands rather for brilliance of literary distinction than for originality of thought. The accepted argument is that familiar to all those who have studied the meaning of the newer Collectivist ideal: divorced from the extravagance of assertion of the earlier pioneers, from the advocacy of every kind of notion which too impetuous reformers have allied—in the public sentiment—with the vision of an economic change. Mr. Wells unfolds a Socialism in no way incompatible with private property, making towards, rather than away from, individual freedom, giving all that is best in the present in far more bounteous fashion than is bestowed at the present, in the enrichment of the common life; in no way hostile to, because in no way concerned with, Christianity, the life of the family, the personal expenditure of each solitary taste and fashion. On the sex question, indeed, where this writer has suffered from a more than usually unfair twisting and distortion of his published utterances, he flares out with unusual vehemence of invective, slashing at one traducer after another, until he finishes with "a certain Father Phelan" of St. Louis, "the revolting ideas of whose pulpit eloquence," says Mr. Wells, "were not mine; they came from some hot, dark reservoirs of evil thoughts that years of chastity and discipline seem to have left intact in Father Phelan's soul."

Mr. Wells's demand for reorganisation is the result of an orderly and intelligent mind against the clumsiness and confusion of present things. The appeal is less to compassion than to reason. He gives, indeed, samples of the hideous life which swarms and festers at the basis of modern society, bald catalogues of squalor and ruin culled from unimpeachable investigation. But here it is the waste of it all, as much as the misery of it, which excites him to an impatient revolt. "If Socialism does not increase the total wealth of the community," he readily acknowledges, "Socialism is impossible." He has no belief in some "wonderful Monday morning" when the old order will suddenly give place to the new. Year by year the great change has to be brought about, "now by this socialisation of a service, now by an alteration in the incidence of taxation, now by a new device of public trading, now by an extension of education." He demands no transformation of human nature. He believes when the change is completed that the world will be a better world. He does not believe that it will be a perfect world. "It would be a world and a life," he frankly confesses, "in no fundamental respect different from the world of to-day, made up of the same creatures as ourselves, as limited in capacity if not in outlook, as hasty, as quick to take offence, as egotistical essentially, as hungry for attention, as easily discouraged—they would, indeed, be better educated and better trained, less goaded and less exasperated, with ampler opportunities for their finer impulses and smaller scope for rage and secrecy, but they would still be human." Yet he thinks that the struggle towards this development is "worth while": one of the few things worth while. He does not believe that the change will come automatically or mechanically, but only by a high effort and devotion of intelligent, efficient men and women. "Socialism is hope, but not assurance," the realisation in and through human effort and purpose of that "good will" from which there comes a regenerate world.

FROM COROT TO SARGENT.*

It is, perhaps, inevitable that Mr. Phythian's "Fifty Years of Modern Painting" should recall Professor Muther's well-known work in four volumes, the "History of Modern Painting." The treatment of the subject is similar, maybe necessarily so. The style is also similar, though possibly a little less picturesque; a difference that may be partly accounted for by the fact that Mr. Phythian has had less space at his command. The compression needed in this volume of under four hundred pages must have been enormous. Mr. Phythian, however, has largely discounted the disadvantage of severe compression, and increased the readability of his book, by concentrating on the schools that, in his opinion, matter most during the period under review. The book is mainly a study of two schools—the English and the French. Of the Dutch, Belgian, German, and Austrian he says but little, of the Italian and Spanish still less, of the Scandinavian practically nothing at all. The American painters are treated with slightly more detail in a gallant effort to show that, heterogeneous as the elements of their art may appear, they are united—or will be—by definite national characteristics. It is due to Mr. Phythian to say that he does his best to maintain impartiality in his treatment of questions that are still being hotly debated, and this is no light achievement. As he observes, critics often take sides violently. The judge of art is nearly always the advocate of this or that style, this or that painter, or country. The present author begins by announcing his intention to avoid prejudice, especially national prejudice, and conscientiously acts up to the announcement. He is, perhaps, a little warm in his criticism of M. De La Sizeranne's criticism of English critics, which jars upon his conception of the entente cordiale, extended to matters of art. On the other hand, he is strenuous in controverting Mr. Holman Hunt, who wrote that Impressionism came from Paris, and was tainted with the profligacy of Parisian life. He will have no insular bias nor Continental imagining of vain things.

* "Fifty Years of Modern Painting." By J. E. Phythian. Grant Richards. 10s. 6d. net.

He has done well to lay emphasis on French art. Paris during the nineteenth century was the centre to which the eyes of artists in other capitals and countries turned. Parisian painting was the mainspring of that of Sweden, Norway, and Denmark, and, in a lesser degree only, of the German States and America. We, too, learned much from the same source. But, whereas the other countries gave back little or nothing in the way of artistic benefit for what they got, England to a certain extent repaid her debt in kind. The art relationship between France and England is a tale of action and reaction. Constable and the Norwich School did much to influence the Romantics of Barbizon, as the French themselves acknowledge. French impressionism, the logical development of that school, opened up undreamt-of possibilities for English painters, particularly landscape painters. These are the two main movements, the ebb and the flood from and to our shores. There were minor movements. Pre-Raphaelitism influenced one or two French artists—Cazin, for example. Our classical school, the school of Leighton, Albert Moore, Poynter, may have learned something from the conservatives on the other side. We need not, however, attempt to estimate the obligation. The establishment, then, of the relationship between English and French art, is one of the chief aims of Mr. Phythian's book. With this is intimately bound up the question of Japanese influence, set free to operate by the opening of the treaty ports in 1853, which has affected the art of both countries to an almost equal extent. A second and not less important aim of the book is to demonstrate the far-reaching importance of the Pre-Raphaelite movement. This, of course, has been done very often before. Mr. Holman Hunt has written volumes upon the subject. Mr. Phythian himself has devoted a book to it. It looms large in every biography of every contemporary British painter. Mr. Phythian cannot, and does not, add anything fresh to our knowledge of it. Yet a full and clear statement of its phenomena and their meaning are as necessary to a book of this character as are print and paper. The movement, or rather the main tendency it embodied, is virtually the fonds et origo of all British art during the last half century. How much more it means than Millais, Rossetti, and Mr. Holman Hunt, Mr. Phythian makes abundantly clear.

With many of Mr. Phythian's findings on individual artists we are in cordial agreement, but a few are rather too nebulous to be convincing. Thus "Rossetti stands alone in having expressed himself with great, and not greatly unequal ease and power, in both poetry and painting." The truth of this equality is more than doubtful; and Mr. Phythian casts doubt upon himself and ambiguity upon the reader by remarking, a few lines further on, "Technically his painting was inferior to his poetry." Of Jean François Millet he says truly that he "painted the life of the fields in all its stern simplicity," but thinks that Corot far excelled him in craftsmanship. Corot was essentially a painter by temperament. Millet was a draughtsman. Their excellences lay in separate fields. To censure Millet for inferior craftsmanship in painting is to blame him for not being Corot. Mr. Phythian's criticisms on living Academicians may be described as those of an admirer of the New English Art Club and should cause some innocent entertainment. We notice one or two errors of fact. Eugène Carrière did not die in 1896, but in 1906; and, to the best of our knowledge, Mr. A. L. Baldry is no longer a member of the New English Art Club, as stated, having left the Club six or seven years ago. The book is excellently illustrated.

THE NOVEL OF THE WEEK.*

MRS. THURSTON's new story sets the critic moralising anew on the supreme difficulty of art. The practical man smiles when he is told that to conquer and rule a province is a small achievement in comparison with the creation of a perfect work of art such as Velasquez's "Philip II." Ask the botanist, however, to create the perfect image of a leaf in wood or wax, and he will tell you it is impossible. So to mirror the infinite subtlety of life by a picture or novel is a task susceptible of infinite degrees of delicacy. The "plain man" neither perceives the difficulty nor comprehends the achievement. Here in Mrs. Thurston's novel, he will say, is a picture of a Waterford solicitor's household, with the main situation between Stephen Carey, the husband, his wife Daisy, and Isabel, the young girl with whom he falls passionately in love. What is there difficult in that? The answer is that this "simple" situation is highly complex, when you come to look into it, and that it includes a thousand aspects, all depending upon a variety of meaning, minute touches. If each touch be obvious, then we have a commonplace novel: if false or exaggerated, then we have a bad novel. But as the subtleties of human life and character are limitless, so, too, the fineness of perception in an artist ranges from the zero of mediocrity to the perfect vision of a Velasquez. The "plain man," thinking only of art as an amusement, fails to grasp that to reveal the meaning of life, and present it æsthetically, through the illusion of art, is a feat which competes with Nature on her own ground. But he may comprehend it better if he realises that on the ladder of art, as on the ladder of life, there is "plenty of room at the top."

The position that "The Fly on the Wheel" occupies, on the rungs, may be indicated by saying that it is lifted well above the mediocre, but is beneath the original pieces of art. While honest and interesting, it is not distinguished by any marked artistic depth or subtlety of outlook. But the novel is to be welcomed, for every honest analysis of life helps to supplant the false standards raised on high in the market-place.

Stephen Carey, a Waterford solicitor, at the age of thirty-eight, finds himself in a secure position, with a good practice, comfortable means, a pretty, commonplace wife, and three small sons. Saddled in youth with heavy responsibilities, bequeathed to him by a bankrupt father, Carey, a man of forceful character and good brains, has had to carve out his own career unaided. But the price he has paid for doing his duty is the sacrifice of his ambitions. He has had in youth "big dreams," but tied down to the petty routine and restricted horizon of life in a small provincial town, he realises bitterly that he will never get his head free from the collar. He has "had to conform in every way," he has been forced to marry for money, and even his work is not what he would have chosen had he been free to go out into the big world, with the struggle and excitement of playing for big stakes.

At this point in his life Carey is suddenly thrown across the girl Isabel Costello, who has just returned from Paris, where she has become engaged to his young brother, Frank. Frank Carey is a weak youth, absolutely dependent for funds on his brother, while studying abroad as a doctor. Carey forbids the match, as quite impracticable: Frank has no prospects for years to come, and the solicitor determines that he will cut off the young man's allowance, if he is such a fool as to encumber himself with a penniless wife. But, the same week, Carey meets Isabel at a local dance, and he realises that in essential womanhood, in the charm of her passionate vitality, she is all that he has wanted, all that he has missed and lost for good when he married the doll-like and narrow little Daisy. The success of the novel certainly lies in the character-drawing of Isabel, this passionate, proud, and vital nature, which is mixed of Irish recklessness and "the beat of warmer blood" inherited from a Spanish grandmother. Mrs. Thurston indicates with not a little delicacy, how the man and the girl are fated by nature to fall in love, and how at the touch of Carey's forceful temperament the image of Frank in the girl's heart fades into insignificance. She has, in fact, engaged herself to Frank, not because she loves him, but because she is eager to feel her own inner forces. She wants excitement, glamour, "fire or sun, battle or ecstasy," but now she realises that Stephen Carey is the man, and that Frank is just a shadow of his brother. Carey, by his swift masculine anger, in sweeping Frank and his wishes aside, has fascinated the girl, and with feminine subtlety she comes to him unexpectedly and gives up Frank. Man-like, he is touched and grateful, and fails to perceive that she is doing it to draw him, insensibly, to her own side. A good example of the absolute precision of touch that Mrs. Thurston fails to reach in one passage, and succeeds in achieving in another, is afforded us in two successive pages:—

*"The Fly on the Wheel." By Katharine Cecil Thurston. William Blackwood. 6s.

"Mr. Carey," she said, the nervous note of tense excitement thrilling in her voice—"Mr. Carey, why do you treat me as if I were a sort of enemy? Why do you speak to me as if I was trying to bring Frank back to ruin, just out of spite? Why have you never asked me to break off with him as—as a sort of favour—as a sort of kindness?"

She looked down at him, her finger-tips resting on the desk, her face brimming with expression.

"Why haven't you ever thought that I might do it to help you—to please you?"

Carey glanced up. "I suppose I only know one way of getting things."

She threw back her head. "And you think women like that way?"

He was silent. It did not come to him to tell her that all his life he had commanded, not asked of, women.

"Don't you think if you had asked, things might have been different?"

"I never ask."

"Ask now!" The words were almost a whisper—a whisper in which he could hear the catch and quiver of her breath.

He twisted round in his seat. "What do you mean by that?"

"What I say. Ask now!"

Native suspicion ousted the surprise in his face. "I don't like being made a fool of!"

* * * * *

"... As for compliments, I can't pay them, I can't pay them, but I'd like to ask you to forgive me for—a lot of things; and I'd like—I'd like, if it's possible, to be friends."

Her glance, quick and warm, flashed to him. "You're sincere when you say that?"

"Yes. I am."

She held out her hand in a swift, free gesture. "Then I'll go. I wanted to say it. Good-bye!"

He took her fingers in his hard, strong grasp.

"Good-bye! And thanks!"

This was their parting. No promise of a future meeting, no suggestion of all that was yet to come. A favour given, a favour received; a clasp of the hands, and an inarticulate sense of mutual understanding.

The reader will have perceived, from the first quoted passage, the awkwardness and unnaturalness of the girl saying openly to the man: "Why haven't you ever thought that I might do it to help you—to please you?" If she had been clumsy enough in feeling to say this, Carey would have at once been placed emotionally on his guard. He would have subtly resented it, and she would have had to retrieve, later on, this false step. In the second passage, however, the analysis does not err. The root of her nature is conveyed in a line, "her glance, quick and warm, flashed to him. 'You're sincere when you say that'"; and the parting waits on the right note of "their inarticulate sense of mutual understanding." The reader will, however, perceive that, even though the fineness of nature be caught, here and there, in the analysis, there is little artistic individuality in the rendering. Hundreds of novelists might treat the situation thus, while, in a subtle or exquisite piece of art, we are always conscious of a special manner of creation. As complex, indeed, as the fleeting expressions of a living face are the fine shades implied in a work of the creative imagination.

We must apologise to Mrs. Thurston for taking her novel as an illustration of the fineness of quality necessary to a true artistic achievement. Let us hasten to add that she has created several living figures of no little interest. Carey's sister-in-law, Mary, always watchfully ready to wound others, and keen to resent any slight, is cleverly observed. Mary's hostility to Isabel when Carey has made his colourless wife, Daisy, invite the girl to join them in the country, of course brings the two into complete unison. Man is fire and the woman is tow, as the proverb says, and the night comes when Carey throws all restraint aside, and tells the girl who has kindled his one deep passion, "Then, by God, I'd go down to hell for you!" We confess that when Carey said this we suspected a false note. Either he is possessed by the thought of her and all rhetoric is far from him, or else he is the emotional Celt of fiction or of fact, and he will eat his own words. And the final scene, in which Father James, the altruistic priest, brings Carey to the renunciation of his love and to going back to his life with the wife he does not love, is not particularly convincing. Nor do we believe in Isabel's suicide on the last page. It is a clever piece of effective stage management; it is, in a manner, impressive; but it annihilates all that she stands for—her scorn, her fierce pride, her independence of soul. The reader may, however, be here asked to send for "The Fly on the Wheel," and decide the delicate questions raised by it for himself.

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

THE late Mr. Albert Pell, who for many years represented South Leicestershire in Parliament, left behind him a volume of memoirs which Mr. Thomas Mackay has prepared for publication and issued under the title of "The Reminiscences of Albert Pell" (Murray, 15s. net). The book makes delightful reading, full of racy anecdote, and marked throughout with the stamp of a sturdy, genial, and rather original temperament. A country gentleman of the old-fashioned type, Mr. Pell had many of the prejudices of his class, but a strong vein of common sense saved him from being the dupe of party phrases and formulas. Though he regarded himself as a Conservative, his political opinions, says his old friend Mr. Bryce, who contributes an interesting "Appreciation," might be best described as half Tory, half Radical. The two subjects he was most interested in were the Poor Law, which he wished to see severely administered, and agriculture, of which he had the knowledge of a specialist. The interest of his reminiscences does not, however, lie so much in what he has to tell us about these questions as in the glimpses he gives of the social conditions which have long since passed away. "Born in 1820," he says, "now over eighty-six years ago, time has carried me through many changes; from tallow candles, snuffers, and rushlights to electric glare; from the tinder-box and brimstone matches to lucifers, . . . from the hobby-horse to the bicycle; from the Margate hoy and waterman's wherries to the excursion steamer, Thames tunnel, and tubes; from Vauxhall Gardens to the Crystal Palace; . . . from the twopenny postman and eightpenny letter to the halfpenny postcard and the telephone; . . . from the sale of our wives to the Divorce Court; from paving-stones to wood and asphalt; from the cesspools to sewers; from the black gown to the surplice; from Tate and Brady to Hymns, Ancient and Modern." He writes about all these and other changes with humour and vivacity. Indeed, it would be hard to find a more entertaining chronicle of the Victorian era than these pages furnish. Every line bears the impress of Mr. Pell's breezy personality, and even Whigs, philanthropists, and Church advocates of what he called Eastward Ho! practices—three classes against whom he had a strong prejudice—will smile as they read the anecdotes in which they are held up to ridicule. Mr. Mackay contributes an excellent introduction, in which some characteristic "Pelliana" are recorded.

* * *

To many readers the account of the fortunes of the Jewish population in this country, given by Mr. Albert M. Hyamson in his scholarly "History of the Jews in England" (Chatto & Windus, 4s. 6d. net.) will be something of a surprise. We are so accustomed to think of them as having undergone so great a degree of persecution, that it is difficult to grasp the idea that there have been periods in our early history when the Jews were not merely tolerated but encouraged. Such a period existed during the reigns of the first three Norman Kings, when the Jews performed the functions of a middle-class, then lacking, and held a useful and even honoured place in the machinery of commerce. William Rufus went even to the length of compelling Jews who had been converted to Christianity to return to their original faith. The early persecutions seem to have been due to envy, excited by the wealth which rapidly became accumulated in Jewish hands. The Church, too, threw its influence on the side of intolerance, and the outburst of fanaticism coincident with the Crusades gave rise to those horrible massacres which disgrace the history of England and of every European nation. Henceforth we see continual alternations of prosperity and persecution, until in 1657 Cromwell granted the right of unrestricted residence, as a result of the efforts of that champion of the Jewish cause, Manasseh ben Israel. Then followed the protracted struggle for the full rights of citizenship, which only ended in 1866. Mr. Hyamson's narrative is written with impartiality and care. It is a useful contribution, not only to Jewish history, but to the history of England as well.

* * *

"To help the reader to understand why he feels that some towers are nobler than others, and to appreciate all towers more truly from a knowledge of their architectural history," is the object which Mr. E. Tyrrell Green, who is Lecturer in Architecture at St. David's College, Lampeter, has set before himself in "Towers and Spires: Their Design and Arrangement" (Wells, Gardner, Darton, & Co., 10s. 6d.). He has certainly furnished the reader who has no special knowledge of architecture with a pleasant volume, which will probably stimulate his interest in that study. Towers and spires have a fascination for most people, and Mr. Green begins by a well-written account of their origin, and a discussion of the main purposes which they have served. He then traces their development through the different periods of architecture, down to the eighteenth century, and ends by chapters on some details of design, and on the position and arrangement of towers. An excellent feature is the series of illustrations, which are well produced, and have been chosen with great care. Most of the drawings are of towers in Great Britain, but examples from Ravenna, Siena, Rouen, Louvain, Bonn, and other Continental cities are included. There are also two maps, one of the Saxon churches in England, and the other showing the distribution of building material in England and Wales.

* * *

THE Northern Territory of South Australia has hitherto received more attention from romancers than from historians. We believe that it was in this region that De Rougemont performed his famous turtle ride and other feats, the tale of which was received with an unwarranted scepticism. The country has been "discovered" a long time. Its coasts were first sighted in the sixteenth century. The first Englishman to visit it was Dampier in the seventeenth century, and in 1814 was published Captain Flinders' book, "Voyage to Terra Australasia." To add to our stock of information about this queer, dark continent comes Mr. Alfred Searcy's commodious volume "In Australian Tropics" (Kegan Paul, 10s. 6d. net). Mr. Searcy spent fourteen years at Port Darwin, in the north-west corner, as a sub-collector of customs. He was sent there in 1882 to enforce the tariff levied, two years previously, against the Malay owners of proas engaged in trading and fishing, and when he left for a more civilised spot in 1896, he carried with him a huge store of entertaining reminiscences, which are now embodied in the book before us. His encounters with the Malays and the Myall aborigines furnish exciting reading. Solid information is provided on the geography and climate, the industries and pleasures, the flora and fauna of those parts. His tales of rats that display an undesirable familiarity, of cockroaches that nibble one's toe-nails, of white ants that can bury a man unawares, of alligators, and of a human species that clothes itself with a strap and a revolver, will be read with all the avidity that the unusual provokes. The "native question" is difficult of solution here as elsewhere, and—as usual—it is complicated by cosmopolitan scoundrelism, the fruit of the fusion of the dregs of many races. Drink and knavery make dark streaks in the side of a narrative that is otherwise light and gossipy. The writing is quite unprofessional; incident follows incident without any unbusiness-like expenditure of words, and the story is embellished with recondite phrases of Colonial slang, as used by persons who "irrigate" when they drink, and talk about empty bottles as "dead marines." Withal, it never pretends to anything more literary, and the absence of affectation gives it a freshness and a value of its own. Mr. Searcy's estimate of Port Darwin as a place of residence seems to be that it is the right place for the right man. He admits that it has all the disadvantages of a tropical country without some of the compensating advantages of the eastern tropics; but he claims for it a certain magnetic fascination, and intimates that a common-sense method of life will keep the European alive. He forecasts, moreover, a future for the port as a strategic base. The book is illustrated with some interesting photographs.

* * *

THE excellent handbook by Mr. G. W. Eve, on "Decorative Heraldry" (George Bell, 6s. net), which was first issued eleven years ago, has now attained the dignity of a second edition. One may recall that the author treats his subject mainly from the artistic standpoint; but he has a sound knowledge of its scientific side, and his second chapter, entitled "A Primer of Heraldry," gives information on terms and technicalities which is valuable to all save the most advanced students. The origin, development, the decay and modern revival of the art, are traced with surprising thoroughness considering the limited space at the author's command.

* * *

THERE is something for regret as well as for approval in the new "Municipal Year-Book" (Edward Lloyd, 7s. 6d. net). It now appears well-nigh double in size and price. While one welcomes much of the additional matter, one cannot help regretting that this useful annual has now passed out of the circle of popular hand-books and attained to something like the solemn dignity of an official encyclopædia. Everything bearing any relation to municipal life has been squeezed within its thousand pages, from the working of the Allotment Act to the latest profits from water and tramway services. The work of all the municipal corporations in the Kingdom is detailed. By the inclusion of the smaller authorities, like urban and rural councils and joint boards, the "Year-Book" can now claim to be the most comprehensive guide to the work of our local authorities published. The new sections include specimen fair-wage clauses, inserted by public bodies in their contracts. First place is given to that of the London County Council, though the "Year-Book" ought not to have classed that body in the section under the head of municipal corporations. We are told that the London County Council fair-wage clause provides that the contractor shall pay his workmen rates of wages not less than the rates "stated in the schedule hereto." Surely it is a serious omission not to give a typical schedule. Or, failing a schedule, the reader ought to be told that the principle on which the schedule is drawn up stipulates that the wages shall be those agreed upon by associations of men and masters, and in practice obtained. This is an important principle, and one that the Labour Bench at the London County Council, under the leadership of the present President of the Local Government Board, had a keen struggle to obtain. Another new section relates to Dock and Harbour Boards. This section is also deficient, in that it does not give the tonnage dues, but simply the total sum the dues yield. What would have been particularly serviceable to the municipal world this year, in view of the Government's promised legislation on the Port of London, would have been a list of the varying rates per ton charged at British ports. A contrast with Continental port charges would have made the list doubly valuable. These omissions notwithstanding, the "Municipal Year-Book" is invaluable to members and officials of local governing bodies.

* * *

WE have received from the Great Western Railway a number of guide-books dealing with the districts to which the company's trains give easy access. The books are prettily illustrated from photographs and old prints, and they contain much information which will be useful to those who are choosing a place in which to spend the Easter holiday. "Historic Sites and Scenes in England" is a little volume which, though intended for the use of American visitors, can hardly fail to interest other readers as well. The books are issued at the low price of threepence each.

SECOND IMPRESSION NOW READY.
MODERN EGYPT

BY THE
EARL OF CROMER.
With Portrait and Map. Two Vols. 8vo, 24s. net.

THIRD IMPRESSION NOW READY.
RAMBLING RECOLLECTIONS
By Sir HENRY DRUMMOND WOLFE.
With Illustrations. Two Vols. 8vo, 30s. net.

SECOND IMPRESSION NOW READY,
THE COMING STRUGGLE IN EASTERN ASIA.

By B. L. PUTNAM WEALE, Author of "Manchu and Muscovite," "The Re-Shaping of the Far East," "The Truce in the East."
With numerous Illustrations and Map, 8vo,
12s. 6d. net.

THE LETTERS OF MARTIN LUTHER.

Selected and Translated by MARGARET A.
CURRIE. 8vo, 12s. net.

 The first collection in English of the Letters of the great Reformer.

A NEW BOOK ON BUDDHISM.
THE INWARD LIGHT.

By H. FIELDING HALL, Author of "The Soul of a People," &c. Second Impression. 8vo,
10s. net.

NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION.
EPIC AND ROMANCE: Essays on Medieval Literature. By PRO-FESSOR W. P. KER. Globe 8vo, 4s. net.
[Eversley Series.]

CONFESSIO MEDICI.

By the Writer of "The Young People." 3s. 6d.
net.

 A volume of essays, full of warm-hearted kindness and quick humour, that appeal to all who take an interest in suffering humanity.

TYPES OF TRAGIC DRAMA.

By PROFESSOR C. E. VAUGHAN, M.A.
Extra Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

 A work which traces the growth of the drama from Aeschylus to Ibsen.

MACMILLAN & CO., LTD., LONDON.

The Daily News

Founded by
CHARLES DICKENS IN 1846.

Honored tradition and the spirit of modern enterprise are combined in "The Daily News." Matters of serious interest are reported at length. Place is also found, in shorter form, for the lighter news items which are a feature of 20th century journalism.

"The Daily News" is the only London Liberal newspaper that devotes every day a whole page to Financial and Commercial matters, Trade and Market reports and Stock Exchange Intelligence.

Its daily Parliamentary report is far more detailed than that of any other $\frac{1}{2}$ d.
paper, and nearly a column is given to the Law List.

If you do not read "The Daily News" it is impossible for you to follow the progress of Liberalism.

HEAD OFFICES—

Bouverie Street, Fleet Street, London, E.C.

SIR HUBERT VON HERKOMER and PUBLIC OPINION

Sir Hubert Herkomer, the distinguished artist, writing from Bushey
to the Editor of PUBLIC OPINION, says, on February 11th, 1908:—

Dear Sir—It gives me great pleasure to tell you how your paper,
PUBLIC OPINION, answers a purpose in my life. Although
I read a great deal, I find it impossible to keep abreast of the trend of higher thought that is going on around me, which can only be gathered from various articles and letters in the newspapers, and articles in magazines. But your paper gives me the assurance that I miss nothing which could be of use to me in the train of thought upon which I may just be engaged,
and seldom does a weekly issue of PUBLIC OPINION appear from which I cannot cull some useful suggestion. As a lecturer on art, I need all the suggestions on life that I can get into my hands, for I treat art in all its phases popularly.
From PUBLIC OPINION I get to know certain modern authors with whose methods of thinking I am in sympathy, and those I follow up further. Your paper does me the service to point to them.

Your selection of current thought is worthy of all praise, for it gives one the wholesome feeling that the world is after all not going to the devil, but contains thinkers and good men and women.

I wish you with all my heart continuous success with your paper.

Yours very truly,
(Sgd.) HUBERT VON HERKOMER.

PUBLIC OPINION.

A Weekly Review of Current Thought and Activity.
EVERY FRIDAY. TWOPENCE.

Edited by PERCY L. PARKER.

The purpose of PUBLIC OPINION is to provide information by means of a weekly review of current thought and activity as they are expressed in the world's newspapers, magazines and books, and to put on record the ideas and activities which make for religious, political and social progress.

PUBLIC OPINION can be obtained from any Newsagent or Bookstall, or will be sent post free for one year to any address in the United Kingdom for 10s. 10d.; and to any place abroad for 13s.
per annum. Orders should be addressed to—

PUBLIC OPINION,
30 & 31, Temple House, Tallis St., London, E.C.
Specimens free on application.
PERCY L. PARKER.

SATURDAY
CARTOONS BY "F.C.G."
SHORT STORIES,
BOOK REVIEWS,
LITERARY ARTICLES,
PROBLEMS AND PRIZES,
SURVEY OF THE WEEK,
BRIDGE, CHESS, PHOTO-
GRAPHY.
NATURE AND SCIENCE,
Etc., Etc.
(One Penny Weekly.)
WESTMINSTER

The Week in the City.

WITH the Bank rate reduced to 3 per cent. the period of easy money has commenced. This will help business men and stimulate enterprise. But recuperation will be slow. Trade and employment are still on the down grade, as the "Labour Gazette" unfortunately shows, though we are still doing wonderfully well compared with either the United States or Germany. In the States the commercial depression has just begun to mend; but progress is likely to be very slow, and the era of commercial failures and receiverships is not yet over. Several of the German bank reports make very unpleasant reading, and the losses of the Dresdner in Canada and elsewhere have awakened sharp criticism in Berlin. Here cheap money has not yet stimulated activity on the Stock Exchange, and the flood of new issues is causing anxiety. As I anticipated, there is not much new capital forthcoming, and the demand for new loans, even at tempting prices, is not keen. The attempt of the directors of the Chartered Company to raise money by a sort of lottery loan was unsuccessful. The underwriters were saddled with 96 per cent. of the San Salvador issue, and many of the new creations are at a discount. People are wondering how and at what price debtor nations like Russia, Turkey, and Germany will get their accommodation. I hope that the pecuniary embarrassments of Constantinople, which are now acute, may lead to the adoption of Sir E. Grey's scheme for Macedonia. Relieved of the Macedonian deficit, the Sultan would be in funds, and he might even be able to find money for the Germans who have contracted to build the new bridge across the Golden Horn. They have been waiting two years without being able to find anything in Turkey to mortgage. As for Russia, her financial position is inscrutable, as usual. The only thing certain is that large sums will be required to keep the Czar's Government in being. The amount will, of course, depend on the military and naval expenditure. If this shows expansion, a further depreciation of Russian credit will occur. Japan is also in some straits. Many small bank failures are reported from Kobe and Osaka. The Government's attempt to nationalise the railways seems to have broken down for want of funds and administrative capacity, and there is talk of a European syndicate to take over the lines. There has been similar talk about the Russian railways. It would be a curious sequel to the Russo-Japanese war if the railways of both countries fell into the hands of foreigners owing to the impoverishment of national capital.

MEXICAN MINERALS.

I am amused to read in a Mexican paper the following "special dispatch," dated Chihuahua, February 27:—

"H. Lawrence Read, a noted mineralogist of Australia, has arrived here. He comes with special mission from the British Government, to study the mineral resources of Mexico. He has visited the mining exhibition, expressing surprise at the variety and richness of the samples displayed. 'If I could send this collection to London,' he said, 'a great number of English business men and miners would come to Mexico and invest their money in mining enterprises.'"

I should advise investors to be very careful not to embark money in Mexican mining ventures, however much surprise may be expressed by noted mineralogists at the variety and richness of Mexican samples. Mexico, no doubt, has been making great progress under the wise rule of President Diaz; but the country is at present suffering from a banking crisis, and there are still many elements of risk and instability. It is obvious, however, that French, American, Canadian, and English financiers are busy preparing to work up a Mexican boom, and we shall probably hear more about "mining samples."

A CANADIAN MORAL.

Perhaps would-be investors in Mexican mines may like to be reminded of a Canadian incident suggested by the report of the Granby Consolidated and the passing of the dividend at the beginning of this month. The Granby Consolidated hails from British Columbia, and everyone concerned in mining and financial undertakings will remember the boom which took place in mining in British Columbia about twelve years ago. For a time everyone talked of the wonders of the Rossland camp and various other would-be mining sections of the Western Province. Scores of mines were organised and floated; mining exchanges were started in Montreal, Toronto, Rossland, and other interested places; and for months interest was diverted from the regular stock exchanges to the mining exchanges. Price fluctuations were enormous, and sensational fortunes were made and lost. But when the boom collapsed, as a Montreal paper reminds us, nothing was left to the holders of the stocks save the certificates. Of the scores of mines floated upon the market, those which are operating to-day, or which are worth much more than the cost of printing the scrip, may be counted on one's fingers. In the Rossland camp a few consolidated groups of mines are still operating. In other parts of the province a few lead and other mines are struggling along. "Granby Consolidated is probably the only copper proposition which has gone straight ahead from the time of its organisation, and has never experienced a really severe set-back." But even that has now been forced to pass its dividend.

AMERICAN RAILWAY NOTES.

A New York contemporary pointed out the other day that, during April, maturing note and bond issues and instalments due on stocks will call for more than $1,000,000 every day, the grand total being $33,435,100. The principal note issue, $6,000,000 Rock Island 4½ per cent. collateral trust gold notes, has been provided for, Messrs. Speyer & Co. having arranged for their extension for another year at 6 per cent. interest. Erie's financial future is still causing concern, but during the last few days a more cheerful view seems to have supervened, and a good judge of affairs in New York tells me that he considers the possibility of a receivership to have been discounted. No important obligations fall due between now and April 1st. The list for next month is:—

NOTES.
Rock Island 4½s	$6,000,000
Erie Railroad disc.	5,000,000
Norfolk and Western equip	300,000
St. Louis and San Francisco equip	154,000
Total	$11,454,000
BONDS.
Great Northern 5s	$4,700,000
Am. L. and T. 3½ per cent. instalment	500,000
New England Tel. 6s	500,000
New Haven 4s	66,100
Total	$5,766,100
STOCK INSTALMENTS DUE.
Great Northern 5s	$3,000,000
Northern Pacific, 12½ per cent.	11,625,000
Soc. stock, 20 per cent.	840,000
T., C. and I., 20 per cent.	750,000
Total	$16,215,000
Grand total	$33,435,100

So far as can be judged, trade is beginning to improve a little in the United States, especially in the West, and when the importation of commodities revives (as it soon must) railway traffics ought to recover. In that case genuine investments in good American railway stocks will probably turn out well, though, of course, there may be set-backs.

RAILWAY RECEIVERSHIPS.

The receivership for the Western Maryland made the seventh railroad in the United States that has confessed bankruptcy since January 1st. Including the Western Maryland, the mileage involved is 6,842. This is by far the worst showing made since 1893. Practically all the roads (we are reminded by the "New York Evening Post") that failed fifteen years ago remained in the hands of receivers until severe readjustment of fixed charges had been made. In some cases it was a question of months; in others of years. A table gives the list of failures for 1908:—

	Mileage.
Seaboard Air Line	1,474
Chicago Great Western	2,821
Macon and Birmingham	97
Detroit, Toledo, and Ironton	435
Chicago, Cincinnati, and Louisville	283
International and Great Northern	1,149
Western Maryland	583
Total Mileage	6,842

A COMPLETE TRAVEL LIBRARY of over 1,000 PAGES

More than 500 beautiful photographic illustrations, including reproductions of valuable old maps and prints.

The above series of Travel Books may be obtained by sending stamps or P.O. for 2/6 to the Superintendent of the Line, Paddington Station, London, W.

JAMES C. INGLIS, General Manager.

G. W. R.

For 2/6 POST FREE

PROCLAIMED BY THE PRESS
TO BE THE NE PLUS ULTRA
OF RAILWAY LITERATURE.

THE DAILY TELEGRAPH says:

"Wholly admirable pictures and brightly-written letterpress well fulfil their purpose."

THE SPHERE says:

"There is not a single point of interest omitted."

THE WORLD says:

"The literary matter is of considerable merit, and the illustrations are admirable."

MADAME says:

"Both dainty and artistic, containing a mine of information written in the proper spirit of appreciation."

The Economist.

(ESTABLISHED 1843.)

Weekly Commercial Times, Bankers' Gazette, and Railway Monitor.

A POLITICAL, LITERARY, FINANCIAL AND GENERAL NEWSPAPER.

PRICE 8d. By Post, 8½d. ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION FOR THE UNITED KINGDOM, £2. COLONIES AND ABROAD, £2 4s.

The established authority on all Financial and Commercial subjects. In addition to a large high-class general circulation, the ECONOMIST is subscribed to by Banking Houses, Chambers of Commerce, Mercantile Firms, and Railway, Insurance, and other Companies throughout the United Kingdom, the Colonies and Abroad; and, as its columns from week to week show, it is the recognised organ for the announcements of some of the most important trades in the Kingdom.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY IN TIME FOR THE MORNING MAILS.

Offices: GRANVILLE HOUSE, ARUNDEL STREET, STRAND, W.C., and of all Booksellers and Newsagents.

BIRKBECK BANK

ESTABLISHED 1851.

SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, HIGH HOLBORN, W.C.

2½ per cent. INTEREST
allowed on Deposit Accounts.

2 per cent. INTEREST
on Drawing Accounts with Cheque Book.

All General Banking Business transacted.
ALMANACK, with full particulars, POST FREE.

C. F. RAVENSCROFT, Secretary.

BOVRIL REPELS INFLUENZA

Scribner's March 1908. Magazine

THE TRAIL OF THE LONESOME PINE, by John Fox, Jr., author of "The Little Shepherd of Kingdom Come." A strong Serial which commenced in the January number.

Chateau and Country Life in France, by Madame Waddington, author of the "Letters of a Diplomat's Wife."

The West in the Orient, by Charles M. Pepper, U.S. Foreign Trade Commissioner. The Transformation of Transportation. Illustrated.

Across the Cordilleras, by Arthur Ruhl. Illustrated. An account of an adventurous and dangerous winter journey over the great Andean Range.

The Art of Millet, by Kenyon Cox. Illustrated. A most interesting and sympathetic study of the personality of the artist and his place in modern art.

SHORT STORIES:

The General Manager, by Robert Herrick.

The Candle Flame, by Virginia Tracy.

Hinkson's Double Life, by Francis Cotton.

For this Relief much Thanks, by Francis Lynde.

On Sale Everywhere. ONE SHILLING.

CHARLES SCRIBNER'S SONS,
TEMPLE HOUSE, TALLIS STREET, LONDON. E.C.

HIGHEST QUALITY TURKISH TOWELS AND SIMILAR GOODS. SOFT AND ABSORBENT.

THE "OSMAN" TURKISH TOWEL.

THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH SHEET.

THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH MAT.

THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH GOWN.

THE "OSMAN" Turkish Goods enumerated here are an absolute necessity in every household. They are a luxury, but not expensive, and can be obtained at prices within reach of every one. Be sure to buy the "Osman" brand and avoid imitations.

MADE BY

BARLOW & JONES LIMITED, MANCHESTER;

And Sold by all High-class Drapers and Upholsterers.

TANGYE OIL ENGINE AUTOMATIC TUBE IGNITION.

NO LAMP
EXCEPT FOR STARTING

TANGYES LTD
BIRMINGHAM.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

OPPOSITE THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

THACKERAY HOTEL

Great Russell Street, London.

NEAR THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

KINGSLEY HOTEL

Hart Street, Bloomsbury Square, London.

Passenger Lifts, Electric Light throughout,
Bathrooms on every Floor,
Spacious Dining, Drawing, Writing, Reading, Billiard
and Smoking Rooms. Heated throughout.

Fireproof Floors, Perfect Sanitation. Telephones. Night Porters.

BEDROOMS (including attendance) from 3/6 to 6/0.Inclusive Charge for Bedroom, Attendance, Table d'Hôte,
Breakfast and Dinner, from 8/6 to 10/6 per day.

FULL TARIFF AND TESTIMONIALS ON APPLICATION.

Telegraphic Addresses { Thackeray Hotel—"Thackeray, London."
Kingsley Hotel—"Bookcraft, London."

FOREIGN HOTELS.

WIESBADEN.HOTEL NASSAU. With fine Bathing Establishment. Situated at the Curplace. "The English Home."ST. MORITZ, ENGADINE.THE BELVEDERE. High-class English Family Hotel, in the finest and sunniest position. Inclusive terms 11 to 20 francs.THE BOOK MONTHLY

NOW ON SALE.

The March "BOOK MONTHLY,"
6d. net., beautifully illustrated, having bright literary gossip, informed special articles, and full information of the books just published and about to be published.

If you are interested in books you should get this dainty magazine regularly; and certainly you should write for a specimen copy to the Publishers, SIMPKIN
MARSHALL & CO., Stationers' Hall Court, London, who will send one free.

"PYRENO"

(REGISTERED)

A PERFECT UNDERWEAR

Should any Garment shrink in the wash it

WILL BE REPLACED.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

LONDON.WILD'S TEMPERANCE HOTELS. J. B. Wild, C.C., Man. Direc.
30-40, Ludgate Hill, E.C.; 70 & 71, Euston Square, W.C.AT BOURNEMOUTH HYDRO.

IDEAL RESIDENCE.

Sun Lounge. Every form of Bath.

BOURNEMOUTH.THE QUEEN, Bath Road. Miss Tye.
Central. Board and Residence, 35/6 to 3 guineas weekly.

NEWLYN'S (Royal Exeter) HOTEL. Close Pier; 1st Class; Moderate.

SILVER HOW. Boarding Est. West Cliff Gdns. From 30s. week.

BRIDPORT (Near West Bay), DORSET.

BOARD RESIDENCE. Every Comfort. 10, West St., Bridport.

BRIGHTON.

THE HOTEL METROPOLE. E. Richard, Manager.

ROYAL YORK HOTEL. H. J. Preston.

BUXTON.

ST. ANN'S HOTEL. First Hotel.

DARTMOOR—YELVERTON.

THE TORS HOTEL. Tel.: 0199. Mrs. F. Sara.

BARON'S TEMPERANCE HOTEL. Magnificent Moor Views.

DEAL.

BEACH HOUSE HOTEL. S. R. Jefferson.

EASTBOURNE.

CLARENCE Private Hotel & Boarding House, Sussex Grdns. 5/- day.

HADDON HALL, Devonshire Place, overlooking Sea. 5/- day.

EXETER.

DELLERS CAFE. Cathedral Close, and at Paignton.

GREAT YELDHAM—ESSEX.

THE WHITE HART HOTEL. Proprietor, W. Pearl.

HENLEY-ON-THAMES.

RED LION HOTEL. Overlooking famous Regatta course.

ILFRACOMBE.

COLLINGWOOD PRIVATE HOTEL. 120 Rooms. Facing Sea.

LEEDS.

HOTEL METROPOLE, 2 minutes' walk from either station.

LIVERPOOL.COMPTON HOTEL, Church Street. Wm. Russell.
Telegrams: "Compton." Telephone: 3032 Royal, 3 wires.LLANELLY.

CLEVELAND HOTEL. J. T. Weaver.

MALDON.

TEMPERANCE HOTEL, Market Hill. C. Simons, Manager.

MALVERN.

HARDWICKE PRIVATE HOTEL. Prop. & M'g'r.—J. Wilson.

MANCHESTER.

THE PRINCES CAFE. Oxford Street.

THE DEANSGATE HOTEL. Deansgate.

MATLOCK.

SMEDLEY'S Hydropathic Establishment. Estab. 1853. H. Challand, Mnger.

ROCKSIDE HYDRO. Tennis, Bowls, &c. Nr. Golf Links. (18 holes).

OXFORD (near).

SUNNINGWELL HALL, Boars Hill. Dry, Sunny, Golf, etc. Lecture

PENTRE.

PENTRE HOTEL, Rhondda. Tel. No. P.O. 30. W. H. Miles.

PLYMOUTH.

GOODBODY'S CAFES. And at Torquay.

SWISS CAFE, Union Street. Moderate. Genoni Bros.

PORTSMOUTH.

SPEEDWELL HOTEL. A. Grigsby, Managing Director.

SOUTHSEA.

STRATHEARN MANSIONS, South Parade. Miss Collis, Manageress.

ST. MORITZ, ENGADINE.BELVEDERE, high-class English Family Hotel. Situated in sunniest and finest position. Inclusive terms 11 to 20 francs.SWANAGE.

"CRAIGSIDE," Board Residence. Tel.: 6. Misses Fell.

TEIGNMOUTH.

REGENT RESTAURANT & Criterion Hall for Catering. W. H. Bonner.

WHITBY.

WEST CLIFF PRIVATE HOTEL. Mrs. T. Newbitt.

WOODFORD GREEN, ESSEX.

WILFRED LAWSON. Temp. Hotel, J. J. Blundell Manager

EDUCATIONAL.

BOOTHAM SCHOOL, YORK.

(Under the Management of the Society of Friends.)

Twenty-six boys passed University Entrance Examinations in 1906 and 1907.

A new feature for post-Matriculation students is a CITIZENSHIP COURSE, including Economics and Modern History with special reference to existing political institutions and social problems.

The School continues to hold a strong position in Leisure-Hour work:—Natural History, Archaeology, Carpentry, etc.

For copies of prospectus and full particulars with regard to scholarships, apply to the Head Master, Bootham School, York.

Head Master: *Arthur Rowntree, Certificate of Distinction in the Theory, History, and Practice of Education, Cantab.THE HINDHEAD SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Principal: Miss J. F. GRUNER, Certificated Student of Girton College, late Second Mistress, Dulwich High School, G.P.D.S.Co. Education thoroughly modern; physical training and outdoor games. Great attention is paid to healthful conditions of life. The boarding-house stands at an elevation of 800 ft.—For prospectus address to BRACKENHURST, HINDHEAD, HASLEMERE, R.S.O.

THE LEYS SCHOOL, CAMBRIDGE.

ENTRANCE SCHOLARSHIPS IN MARCH.

Preparatory School at Hitchin recognised by the Governors. Enquiries should be addressed to the BURSAR.

INFORMATION AND ADVICE AS TO SCHOOLS.

THE SCHOLASTIC, CLERICAL, AND MEDICAL ASSOCIATION, LTD. (a body of Oxford and Cambridge graduates), gives advice and assistance without charge to Parents and Guardians in the selection of schools (for GIRLS AND BOYS) at home or abroad, and as to Tutors (ARMY, NAVY, UNIVERSITY, &c.). A statement of the requirements should be sent to the Manager,

R. J. BEEVOE, M.A., 22, Craven Street, Trafalgar Square, W.C.
Telegrams: "TRIFORM, LONDON." Telephone No. 1854 GERRARDSEASIDE SCHOOLS FOR GIRLS.*BROADWATER HALL, WORTHING.

Good English Education. Eight Acres of Grounds.

LE PLEIN AIR, DIEPPE.Languages, Accomplishments, Needlework, Cookery.
Principals—THE MISSES TRITTON.AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE, TAMWORTH.

YOUTHS TRAINED FOR HOME OR COLONIES.

Farm, 1,000 acres. Carpentry, Smith's work. Riding and Shooting taught. Prospectus.

WILLASTON SCHOOL, NANTWICH

The next Entrance Examination will be held at the SCHOOL ON MARCH 31st.

For particulars of admission on the Foundation, apply to the Head Master.

BOOKSELLERS.

Our Offer THE S.S. WORKER'S BIBLE6/-

for 3/6

Postage 4d.

Abroad 8d.

Containing a selection of the best Aids to Bible Study, most suitable for a Young Teacher or Elder Scholar. Good, clear type, portable size. Size, 5½ by 4½ by 1½ inches, with references, concordance, atlas, illustrations of antiquities, etc. Handsomely bound in limp Morocco, overlapping edges, round corners, red under gold edges, elastic band, each Bible in box. This Bible can be had with new thumb index on edge, at 1s. extra.

THE LONDON BIBLE WAREHOUSE,
53, Paternoster Row, E.C.BOOKS. Ancient and Modern, Bought, Sold and Exchanged.*THOMAS THORP, 100, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.
(And at READING.)MONTHLY CATALOGUES FREE.

Mr. Thorp has incorporated the business in Review Books carried on for many years by Mrs. Hindley at Booksellers' Row, and at the above address.

ARUNDEL CHROMOS.LARGE number in Stock. Many rare ones. Send stamp for this month's list (giving size and shape of each).—Saint Jude's Dépôt, Birmingham.

BOOKSELLERS.

406 pages, 8vo, cloth, 2s. post free.

HEAVEN AND HELL:Things Heard and Seen.By EMANUEL SWEDENBORG.

JOHN GREENLEAF WHITTIER wrote:—"There is one grand and beautiful idea underlying all Swedenborg's revelations or speculations about the future life. His remarkably suggestive books are becoming familiar to the reading and reflecting portion of the community."

LONDON: SWEDENBORG SOCIETY, 1, Bloomsbury St.

J. POOLE & CO., 104, Charing Cross Road, LONDON'*School, Classical, Mathematical, Scientific, and Students'BOOKSELLERS.

NEW AND SECOND-HAND.

All enquiries as to Prices of Books in our VERY LARGE STOCK answered.

UNITARIANISM and THE NEW THEOLOGY.

EXPLANATORY PAMPHLETS SENT POST FREE.

UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION,

ESSEX HALL, ESSEX STREET, STRAND, W.C.

BOOKS WANTED.—£20 each offered. Guy Mannering, 1st edit., 3 vols., 1815, in boards uncut. Thackeray's Vanity Fair, 20 Nos., 1847-48. Vicar of Wakefield, 2 vols., Salisbury, 1766. Walton's Angler, 1653. Paradise Lost, 1667. Lamb's Shakespeare Tales, 2 vols., boards, 1827, 30/- each offered for. Scrope's Salmon Fishing, 1843. Gardiner's History of England, 2 vols., 1863. Ireland's Napoleon, 4 vols., coloured plates. Jesse's George Selwyn, 4 vols., 1843. Books with inscriptions written inside by Carlyle, Meredith, Keats, Lamb, &c. All books with coloured plates by Ackerman, &c. Special list of wants free, high prices paid. Please let us know your wants. We can supply everything.—HOLLAND BROS., Book Experts, 21, John Bright St., Birmingham. [Bargain, Harmsworth's Encyclopedia, 10 vols., 25/- cost £2 16s. net.]

MISCELLANEOUS.

Curio Club
Bargains

Private persons desirous of disposing of antiques at bargain prices will find a ready sale for same at the "London Opinion Curio Club" 107, Regent Street, London, W.

FERTILISERS for HORTICULTURAL USE.—Write for descriptive price list; carriage paid for 4 cwt. and upwards.—Hy. Richardson & Comp., Manufacturers of Artificial Fertilisers, Skeldergate Bridge, York.PARR'S BANK, LIMITED.

NOTICE IS HEREBY GIVEN that the Rate of Interest allowed by this Bank at the Head Office and Metropolitan Branches, on Deposit at seven days' call, is One-and-a-Half per cent. per annum until further notice.

R. W. WHALLEY, General Manager.

Bartholomew Lane, E.C., 19th March, 1908.

NOTICE.

THE NATION is published weekly. Applications for copies and Subscriptions should be sent to THE NATION Office, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent Garden.

Terms of Subscription, Including Postage:

HOME, 26s. PER ANNUM. FOREIGN, 30s. PER ANNUM.

Cheques should be made payable to THE MANAGER, THE NATION, and crossed "National Provincial Bank."

Telephone No. Gerrard 4035.

Telegrams: "Nationetta," London.

THE NATION may be obtained from the following book-sellers abroad:—

Paris—Galignani's Library, Rue de Rivoli.

Paris—W. H. Smith & Son: Bookshop, 248, Rue de Rivoli.

Nice—Galignani's Library.

Stockholm—Norden and Jephson.

Vienna—Mr. William Frick, Graben 27.

Christiania—The Cammermeyer Boghandel, Carl Johans Gade, 41 and 43.

Melbourne, Sydney, Brisbane, Perth, West Australia—Gordon and Gotch.

Where single Copies can be obtained, and Subscriptions are received.

Messrs. METHUEN have much pleasure in announcing that Mr ARCHIBALD MARSHALL'S New and Delightful Novel, MANY JUNES, has passed at once into a SECOND EDITION. A THIRD Edition of FLOWER O' THE ORANGE, by AGNES & EGERTON CASTLE, is READY, and SECOND EDITIONS have been printed of MAN AND THE CASSOCK, by Mrs. DAVID G. RITCHIE, and of A SHEAF OF CORN, by MARY E. MANN, COLONEL KATE, by K. L. MONTGOMERY, and BAD TIMES, by GEORGE A. BIRMINGHAM.

THE SENTIMENTAL ADVENTURES OF JIMMY BULSTRODE, by MARIE VAN VORST, is NOW READY, and another New Romance is THE DUKE'S MOTTO, by JUSTIN HUNTLY MCCARTHY. THE COWARD BEHIND THE CURTAIN, by RICHARD MARSH, is also READY.

A STAR OF THE SALONS. By CAMILLA JEBB. With 20 Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

This book tells the life story of Mlle. de Lespinasse, her times (1732-76) and her contemporaries, her strange early history, her friendships, and her love story.

FOLK-LORE AS AN HISTORICAL SCIENCE. By G. L. GOMME. With many Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net. [The Antiquary's Books.]

THE REAL INDIA. By J. D. REES, C.I.E., M.P. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

This work gives an abstract of the history of India, showing how the present dispensation arose, and how it differs from its predecessors. Chapters deal with how India is actually governed, with the land system, with the Native States, with the frontier question, with the problems of the present day in India, and possible or desirable reforms.

THE SAINTS IN ART. By MARGARET E. TABOR. With 20 Illustrations. Fcap. 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

This book gives short accounts of all the more important saints represented in art, with the legends connected with them, and explanations of their attributes, or symbols.

FAMOUS FRENCH SALONS. By FRANK HAMEL. With many Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

The book deals with those in the very forefront among Salonnières, namely, Madame de Rambouillet, la Grande Mademoiselle, the incomparable Ninon de Lenclos, Madame de Sévigné, Madame de Maintenon ("widow of a poet, wife of a king"), Madame du Deffand, Mlle. de Lespinasse, Madame de Staël, and Madame Récamier.

DISEASES OF OCCUPATION. By THOMAS OLIVER, M.D. With Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

The object of the book is to present to the general reader, to statesmen, employers of labour, medical men, and all interested in industrial hygiene, a short but comprehensive account of diseases due to occupation. [The New Library of Medicine.]

THE ROMANCE OF GEORGE VILLIERS, FIRST DUKE OF BUCKINGHAM, AND SOME MEN AND WOMEN OF THE STUART COURT. By PHILIP GIBBS. With many Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 15s. net.

ON NOTHING AND KINDRED SUBJECTS. By

HILAIRE BELLOC, M.P. Fcap. 8vo, 5s.

The Essays in this book are concerned with Nothing, and though it is impossible that they should exhaust such a subject, they consider many of its aspects, especially as they are to be discovered in travel, and in the observation of men. They deal with the Loss of Youth, of Manuscripts, with Death, with the Sufferings of the Rich, the Love of Dogs, Winged Horses, Fools, Politicians, and the Art of Coming to an End.

THE LIVES OF ST. FRANCIS OF ASSISI. By THOMAS OF CELANO. Translated into English by A. G. FERRERS HOWELL. With a Frontispiece. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

THE LIFE OF NAPOLEON BONAPARTE. By S. BARING-GOULD. With over 150 Illustrations and a Photogravure Frontispiece. Cheaper Edition. Royal 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

"Taken as a whole, we do not hesitate to say that this combined product of narrative writing and art will give the English reader a clearer and more complete idea of the complicated and colossal personality of Napoleon than it is possible to gather from any other work of equal extent."—St. James's Budget.

MY MEMOIRS. By ALEXANDRE DUMAS. Translated by E. M. WALLER. With Frontispieces in Photogravure. In 6 vol. crown 8vo, 6s. each. Vol. III.

THE THIRTEEN COLONIES OF NORTH AMERICA. By REGINALD W. JEFFERY, M.A. With 8 Illustrations and a Map. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

FUNCTIONAL NERVE DISEASES. By A. T. SCHOFIELD, M.D., Hon. Phys. Friendenheim Hospital. With 3 Diagrams. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net. [The New Library of Medicine.]

RICHARD KENNOWAY AND HIS FRIENDS. By KATHERINE STEUART. A Sequel to "By Allan Water." Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

ENGLISH PASTORAL DRAMA from the Restoration to the Date of the Publication of the Lyrical Ballads (1660-1798). By JEANNETTE MARKS, B.A., M.A. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

"English Pastoral Drama" puts in concise and readable form the results of exhaustive study. Its criticisms and deductions are valuable, for the work is from the true sources, and not a compendium of what has already been written on the subject.

DEVOTIONS FOR EVERY DAY OF THE WEEK AND THE GREAT FESTIVALS. By JOHN WESLEY. Edited, with an Introduction, by CHARLES BODINGTON, Canon of Lichfield Cathedral. Small pott 8vo, cloth, 2s.; leather, 2s. 6d. net.

PRECES PRIVATE. By LANCELOT ANDREWES, Bishop of Winchester. Translated by F. E. BRIGHTMAN, M.A., Canon of Lincoln. Edited, with an Introduction, by A. E. BURN, D.D., Rector of Handsworth and Prebendary of Lichfield. Small pott 8vo. Cloth, 2s.; leather, 2s. 6d. net.

HUMANITY AND ITS PROBLEMS. By A. Hook. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

An inquiry, in the light of evolution, into the essential nature of the social and other problems which at present face the Western world: a brief explanation of the nature of the evolutionary process; a survey of the origin and development of the human mind, of religion, and of political and social systems.

RICHES AND POVERTY. By L. G. CHIOZZA MONEY, M.P. Fourth and Cheaper Edition. Crown 8vo. 1s. net.

Please write at once to Messrs. METHUEN for their LIST of NEW BOOKS. It is well illustrated, and very interesting. Send also for their LIST of NEW NOVELS.

METHUEN & CO., 36, Essex Street, London, W.C.

FICTION.

MANY JUNES. By ARCHIBALD MARSHALL, Author of "Exton Manor." Second Edition. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"A complete picture, half melancholy, half sanguine, and wholly interesting."—Morning Post.

"A finished and delightful work."—Morning Leader.

"From the first page to the last the story grips and interests; it is full of observation, and contains many passages of great tenderness and beauty."—Country Life.

FLOWER O' THE ORANGE. By AGNES and EGERTON CASTLE. With a Frontispiece in Colour. Third Edition. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"In each there are the sparkle of romance and the glow of the adventurous and impatient spirit of youth."—Scotsman.

"The winds of chivalry and elegant passion blow through these pages."—Daily Chronicle.

"A casket of gems."—Birmingham Gazette.

THE VIRGIN WIDOW. By RANDAL CHARLTON. Crown 8vo, 6s.

THE BAD TIMES. By GEORGE A. BIRMINGHAM.

Crown 8vo, 6s. "A strong, wholesome book, partly political, partly romantic, and wholly interesting."—Daily Express.

"A strong, clean, and wholesome book."—Daily Mail.

THE SCOURGE. By WARRINGTON DAWSON, Author of

"The Scar." Crown 8vo, 6s.

"The story is largely and finely conceived."—Times.

"A well-written, uncommon, and even distinguished novel."—Morning Leader.

A SHEAF OF CORN. By MARY E. MANN, Author of

"The Sheep and the Goats." Crown 8vo, 6s.

"They are dramas in miniature."—Scotsman.

"Mrs. Mann has the art intimately and sincerely to write of the life of the very poor without alienating sympathy."—Manchester Guardian.

THE MAGISTRATE'S OWN CASE. By Baron ROSEN-

KRANTZ. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"A study in criminal investigation of considerable originality and constructive skill."—Times.

MAN AND THE CASSOCK. By Mrs. DAVID G. RITCHIE,

Author of "The Truthful Liar." Crown 8vo, 6s.

"This novel is a striking achievement... impossible to skip a single page of a singularly engrossing book. It is not long, yet there is more wit than is to be found in twenty. Mrs. Ritchie is extraordinarily sensitive to the lighter side of the human comedy."—Spectator.

THE YOUNG COLUMBINE. By DOROTHEA DEAKIN.

With a Frontispiece by LEWIS BAUMER. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"Humour, tenderness, sympathy, and a nice sense of human nature go to the making of Miss Deakin's book, which is outside the ordinary lines of fiction, and full of individual charm."—Westminster Gazette.

A POPPY SHOW. A Volume of Stories. By H. B.

MARRIOTT WATSON. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"The indefinable charm of Mr. Watson's writing, and his graceful wit make a book for all to read and enjoy."—Pall Mall Gazette.

COLONEL KATE. By K. L. MONTGOMERY, Author of

"The Cardinal's Pawn." Crown 8vo, 6s.

"An eventful story, stirring, full of colour, and marked by true literary workmanship."—Daily Mail.

"A romance full of spirit and the joy of life."—Daily News.

The Nation

VOL. II., No. 26.]

SATURDAY, MARCH 28, 1908.

[PRICE 6D.
Postage: U.K., 4d. Abroad, 1d.]

CONTENTS.

PAGE	PAGE
THE DIARY OF THE WEEK ... 921	Liberal Organisation. By John Griffiths ... 937
POLITICS AND AFFAIRS:—	Women and the Peckham Election. By St. John G. Ervine ... 938
The Answer to Peckham ... 924	Women and Liberalism. By Margaret Ashton, Helen Violet Taylor, and Susan Cunningham ... 938
The Last of the Conservatives ... 924	"The Rich Man's Dilemma." By F. N. Laycock ... 939
The Rebellion of Natal ... 925	The Perils of Land Purchase. By R. L. Outhwaite ... 940
The End of a War-Scare ... 927
LIFE AND LETTERS:—	POETRY:—
Comfort. By John Galsworthy ... 928	The Keeper. By Alexr. J. Grant ... 940
The New Electioneering ... 929
A Dance of Death ... 931	THE WORLD OF BOOKS ... 941
Warriors of Spring ... 932	Books to be Read ... 941
FISCAL FALLACIES:—	REVIEWS:—
I. A Tariff as a Cure for Unemployment. By J. A. H. 933	The Pro-Consul as Historian. I. ... 942
CONTEMPORARIES:—	An Art of the Past ... 943
The Celebration of Genius ... 934	Early Christian Ethics ... 944
ART:—	Pastoral and Adventure. By Professor C. H. Herford ... 946
Mr. Brangwyn's Exhibition 935	Modern Mountaineering ... 946
COMMUNICATIONS:—	A Novel of Temperament ... 948
The Need for a New Corrupt Practices Bill. By Arthur J. Williams ... 936	Books in Brief ... 948
LETTERS TO THE EDITOR:—	THE WEEK IN THE CITY ... 952
Licensing and Insurance. By Ernest W. Leighton ... 936
Religious Instruction and the Rights of Parents. By G. L. Bruce ... 937

[The Editor will be pleased to consider manuscripts if accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes. He accepts no responsibility, however, for manuscripts submitted to him.]

Diary of the Week.

THE wording of the later bulletins on the Prime Minister's illness has quickened the universal and keen sympathy on his behalf. It is a relief to know that he suffers no pain, and bears his disablement with the tranquil courage and unvarying sweetness of temper which are his characteristics, and which endear him to those who have the happiness to serve him or to be in personal relationship with him.

* * *

WE observe that the "Times" of this (Friday) morning deals with the technical difficulty as to re-election which might arise if Mr. Asquith were to be called on to undergo a change of offices, and to combine the headship of the Government with the post of the First Lord of the Treasury or of Chancellor of the Exchequer. We deprecate these speculations, but it is clear that if at any later period a change should occur, the considerations which would arise would be political no less than mechanical. It would be necessary to consider the general balance of forces in the Government. Clearly the more advanced section could not suffer in any such arrangement. It would be natural, for example, to say that, if Mr. Asquith relinquished the Chancellorship, it would be at the disposition of the most distinguished personality in the Cabinet, and that, if Mr. Morley declined it, the claims of the President of the Board of Trade could not well be ignored. There is the further point of the introduction of fresh blood, and of Mr. Churchill's long-contemplated and well-deserved promotion to Cabinet rank.

THE Peckham election has resulted in the return of Mr. Gooch, the brewers' candidate—we can hardly describe him as a Conservative or a Unionist—by a majority of 2,494—slightly larger than that which Mr. Goddard Clarke secured at the General Election. The Conservative poll, indeed, was very nearly doubled. The contest in 1906 was not entirely political, for this highly Conservative constituency was aggrieved by the rejection by the House of Lords of the Bill carrying the Southern tramways over the Thames. But if the contest of two years ago was unusual, the battle of last Tuesday was unprecedented. The constituency was swept from end to end by a mass of outside campaigners and almost buried beneath a shower of posters and pictorial appeals. The politics were, in the main, those of the public-house; but coalowners, suffragettes, racing tipsters, and the Tariff Reform peripatetics also lent their aid. Every tavern was an informal committee-room for Mr. Gooch, and the narrow streets, with their rows of orators on tubs, looked and sounded like Epsom course on a race day. The "Morning Post" complains of the "excesses" of the publicans' party, but the tactics succeeded. The suffragettes claim, rightly or wrongly, a share of the success, with a view, doubtless, of building up a claim of gratitude on a coming Conservative Government. Their tactics are bold, but we are afraid that their identification with the liquor trade ends the hope of a Liberal Suffrage Bill.

* * *

THE proper answer to the Peckham election was given in a firm speech by Mr. Lloyd George at a mass meeting of temperance reformers at the Queen's Hall, on Thursday night. Naturally, no Administration could yield to a virtual demand on the part of "the trade" to turn its "expectations" in the matter of licences into a freehold interest, planted for ever on the community. Mr. George denounced "the trade" as equally powerful, unscrupulous, and ruthless. Peckham was only the opening of the fight, which would be sustained without flinching until the Government and the party had seen it through.

* * *

BOTH the Primate and the Bishop of London are standing firm in support of the Licensing Bill, in spite of the hostile action of the minority of the episcopate, led by the Bishops of Manchester and Chichester. The Archbishop of Canterbury repels the threats of "the trade" against the Church, and says that "it is difficult to conceive of any course of action less likely to influence our opinion." He added that in principle the Bill gave effect to the policy of the Church of England Temperance Society, but hinted at "more generous" terms in regard to the time-limit. The general machinery of the Bill, he insists, is also in harmony with the temperance propaganda of the Anglican Church.

* * *

WE have not seen in the Press a neater exposure of one side of the bellowing attack on the Licensing Bill than that which Mr. Jerome K. Jerome, the novelist and playwright, contributes to the "Daily Telegraph." It runs as follows:—

If—as we are solemnly assured—the closing of public-houses will not diminish drinking, why should the brewers and their shareholders object to the bill? In other words: If the breweries, through the medium of the 60,000 public-houses to be left standing, are going to sell precisely the same amount of liquor—some enthusiasts say more—as they now get rid of through the present medium of 90,000 houses, what in the holy name of dividends have the widow and the orphan to complain of? It seems to me that, according to their own showing, the bill is going to save the owners of tied houses some 33 per cent. of their working expenses without lessening by a penny piece their takings. I have put this point before our local "Committee for the Promotion of True Temperance Reform" (temporary office at the Blue Lion), but they do not seem to know the answer.

* * *

THE Duke of Devonshire died on Tuesday at Cannes in his seventy-fifth year. His work in politics was done, for the Liberal-Conservatism for which he stood has almost ceased to exist. He had three chances of the Premiership—first, as an alternative to Gladstone in 1880, and, secondly and thirdly, as the head of the Unionist combination. He would have accepted the first opportunity if his great rival and the Liberal Party had been willing. The other two he declined. He was a man of loyal but rather stubborn temper, having little sympathy with the two statesmen whom he alternately supported and opposed—Gladstone and Chamberlain. His moral strength, which was great, lay in the sincerity and unity of his mind and character. Mr. Asquith said truly that no other public man enjoyed such full measure of general respect, and that this was due largely to his "tranquil indifference to praise or blame." It was also the tribute to his very English temperament and his great position. Mr. Balfour thought that the Duke was "the most persuasive speaker" he had known, largely because he told his hearers the "processes of his mind" as well as their results. Lord Rosebery added the further criticism that the Duke's aim was always to arrive at "the kernel of the matter," and that men so truthful formed the "glory of their country."

* * *

THE Parliamentary Commission, representing the chief members of various parties in the Belgian Chamber, have accepted the new Colonial Law, which regulates the government of the Congo State, and have assented to annexation to Belgium. The law has been improved since its first draft, but, even as it stands, it maintains the most serious abuses of the Leopold Administration, and Sir Edward Grey is being strongly pressed to declare his disapproval of it.

* * *

ON Tuesday Prince Bülow made his long-expected declaration on foreign policy. His attitude to France over Morocco was friendly, with a touch of ice in it, and he treated the episode of the Tweedmouth letter with great discretion and good temper. The form of the Kaiser's letter was private, its contents political, but the assertion that the Emperor desired to influence British armaments was an "absolutely unwarranted misrepresentation." The British Fleet was many times stronger than the German, and "British world-supremacy" (a large phrase) should be guaranteed as British statesmen thought fit. Prince Bülow hinted that the Emperor had expressed his pride in his post of Admiral of the British Fleet, and his fondness (which is well known) for British life. Why should there be a "reckless and malicious" campaign in England against Germany and Germany alone, considering her purely defensive attitude on the naval question?

* * *

THIS week has yielded a semi-official Austrian pronouncement on Sir Edward Grey's proposal for the appointment of an independent Governor of Macedonia, and an oblique criticism by Prince Bülow. The Austrian communiqué finds the scheme impracticable, among other reasons because the Great Powers could not give the Sultan a territorial guarantee against the encroachments of the Balkan States. Prince Bülow cannot approve "dangerous innovations" which would "imperil the sovereignty of the Sultan, and thus provoke Turkey and her Mohammedan population to extreme resistance." This ignores the fact that members of the Concert could not take a more effectual way of inviting Turkey to resist a proposal than themselves condemning it beforehand. The Macedonian situation seems now to be that the Müritzsteg programme is dead. But Sir Edward Grey's bold and statesmanlike proposal is alive, whatever the Austro-German coalition may do. A strong address of support has been signed by over one hundred members of the House of Commons, and English public opinion is practically unanimous in its favour. Italy and France will probably develop support of it.

* * *

THE London County Council Moderates appear to have got more than they bargained for in the report by Messrs. Peat & Pixley, chartered accountants, on the Progressive tramway accounts. The origin of this remarkable document is to be found in the charges of "cooking," "rigging," and "faking" the tramway accounts which the present majority brought against their opponents at the last County Council election. The auditors lay down three principles:—

(1) They regard the capital spent by the Council in the acquisition of the horsed lines as a "loss" because some of those lines are now superseded by electric traction, and they contend that this "loss" should be written or paid off at a more rapid rate than is provided for under the Council's statutory obligations;

(2) They suggest that the renewals reserve fund is £77,000 short; and

(3) They demand that the tramways shall be charged with a larger proportion of the cost of street improvements, although they avoid stating how much that proportion should be.

The auditors' recommendations are accompanied by so many qualifications that it is quite impossible to estimate the amount of new liabilities which would be thrown upon the tramways accounts in the event of the suggestions being adopted. As, however, the "loss" on the horsed lines is placed at a million sterling, it is clear that those liabilities would be so great that they could only be met by increasing the tramway fares or by making a demand upon the rates.

* * *

THE principle that superseded assets are a "loss" that ought to be written off or repaid without delay is absolutely novel in municipal and company finance. In the present case it is assumed that when the London County Council purchased the tramways it merely acquired old iron rails and worn-out rolling-stock. The fact that the Council at the same time acquired the freehold of the streets for tramway purposes—itsself an asset which a well-known tramway engineer was willing to rent at the colossal sum of half a million a year—is ignored. Judged by the commercial standards which Messrs. Peat & Pixley wish to apply to the tramway accounts of the London County Council, very few tramway enterprises belonging to private companies are in a satisfactory financial condition. The superseded plant value of the Metropolitan Electric Company is set down in the Board of Trade returns at £219,200; the available reserves, apart from repairs and renewals, are nil. The Swansea, Gateshead and District, South Staffordshire, Spen Valley, and the Wakefield and District Companies return their superseded plant values at amounts ranging from £3,500 to £102,900. Their available reserves at the date of the last Board of Trade returns were nil. What would happen to these and many other companies if they were suddenly called upon to return these superseded plant values to the shareholders? The municipalities, as a matter of fact, are in a much sounder position than private companies in regard to this matter, as, by means of their annual sinking fund payments, they are paying off their debts at a comparatively rapid rate.

* * *

TAKING, for example, the six municipalities of Huddersfield, Hull, Leicester, Bradford, Manchester, and Sheffield, and comparing them with the six companies of Blackpool, Dudley, Gateshead, the Metropolitan Electric, Swansea, and Wolverhampton District, we find that, whilst the former have sinking funds amounting to £126,000, only one of the companies named has a sinking fund at all, and that is represented by the trivial sum of £1,500. The startling propositions contained in this report have created a sensation in financial circles. Their reception by the London County Council Moderates was amusing. After bestowing upon them a shy and half-hearted blessing, the Chairman of the Finance Committee on Tuesday explained that the recommendation on superseded assets could not possibly come into operation until all the horse lines are electrified. As this is not likely to happen for ten years at the rate at which the Moderates are reconstructing, the present majority will presumably continue to conduct tramway finance on Progressive lines.

* * *

THE American Fleet has reached the Pacific coast, with no greater loss than the shedding of its commander, Admiral Evans. It is to return by the Suez Canal, and to visit Australia on its way. The Australian invitation has been ingeniously countered by the Japanese Government, for Japan has likewise issued an invitation which, after a little hesitation, the United States Government has accepted. The situation is not without its humour, though it is a little difficult to see what America is getting from this expensive and elaborate parade. When it was first announced, the official explanation was that the only object was a purely naval exercise, but President Roosevelt has just been telling M. André Tardieu of the "Temps" that he had two reasons—first to drive a love of the navy into American heads, and second, to show the Powers the might of the United States. In his faith in "the big stick" in International affairs, President Roosevelt is very like his friend the Kaiser.

* * *

THE intimacy of the relations between Church and State in Austria is being illustrated by the dispute now raging round Professor Wahrmund. Professor Wahrmund is Professor of Canon Law in the legal faculty of Innsbrück University, and he delivered some lectures, afterwards reprinted, in which he criticised, with some touches of not over fine irony, Catholic doctrines. The Papal Nuncio, therefore, requested his dismissal, on the ground of heresy, and by the manner of doing so raised another and quite different conflict with the Foreign Office. The Nuncio's request has been met by a protest from the Senate of the Vienna University against a step which would subject the Universities to clerical control. Professor Wahrmund, it should be noted, is a professor in the legal, not the theological, faculty, and since the denunciation of the Concordat the Papacy has no formal rights over University education; but a large section of the Reichstag and several Ministers would apparently dismiss the Professor had not the Nuncio indiscreetly provoked conflict with the Foreign Minister.

* * *

SIR AUCKLAND COLVIN, who died on Tuesday at the age of seventy, like his more famous colleague, Lord Cromer, with whom he more than once exchanged offices, had a mixed Indian and Egyptian career. Its most famous passage arose from his appointment as English Comptroller of the Egyptian Debt. He showed great personal courage during a turbulent phase of the Arabi movement, when he stood by the Khedive's side and urged him to be firm before the soldiers, and he was one of the most powerful personal factors in the hardening of British power in Egypt. He was unsympathetic to the national movement, and developed similar tendencies in his later Indian career as Finance Minister and Lieutenant-General of the North-West Provinces.

* * *

MAJOR ARTHUR GRIFFITHS, whose death at Beaulieu was reported on Wednesday, saw fifty years of public service, chiefly in the administration or inspection of prisons. He was a disciplinarian of the kind approved by the late Sir Edmund Du Cane, to whose period of authority at the Home Office may be traced the more rigid characters of the present system of penal servitude. "Your punishments seem rather severe," said Mr. Secretary Cross to Major Griffiths at Millbank. "I have found that severe punishments pay best, sir," was the answer. It was Major Griffiths who was mainly responsible for the building of Wormwood Scrubs, and this was a difficult task, cleverly and tactfully performed. The builders were almost all long-sentence men, whose terms were coming to an end, and, to borrow an historic phrase, they "behaved splendidly." In 1877, the year in which the Government took the prisons over from the local justices, Major Griffiths was made an inspector, and this office he held till his retirement in 1896. A voluminous writer, a little careless in his style, and not unassailable as to facts, he has left two works of very fair value—the "Memorials of Millbank," and, more especially, the "Chronicles of Newgate." He had a wide personal popularity, a bright youthfulness long after he was sixty years of age, an esoteric knowledge of the art of dining, and uncommon gifts as a raconteur.

* * *

THE Exhibition of the Royal Institute of Painters in Water-Colours opened this week. So far as we can judge, the number of exhibitors who have nothing to say, and no particular skill in saying it, has slightly increased; otherwise the character of the collection is the same as that which has sufficed for the Society for some years past. A drawing of some importance is shown by Mr. Dudley Hardy in his "Toil—Pas de Calais," where he renders a crowded seashore scene under a silvery effect of storm and rain, and imparts to it an animation and a sincerity which are not so apparent in his smaller works in the too modern Dutch manner. Mr. Leslie Thomson, Mr. James Orrocl, Mr. R. Talbot Kelly, and Mr. W. Rainey, among the older members, and Miss Frances Drummond, Mr. A. Van Anrooy, and Mr. A. C. Gould, among the unattached, help to raise the standard. The humorists, unfortunately, are disappointing this time.

Politics and Affairs.

THE ANSWER TO PECKHAM.

WE can understand the tempered spirit with which the reputable section of the Conservative Press surveys the dubious blessing of the Peckham election. If, during the next year or so, the art of electoral appeal is to be summed up in a poster embroidered with the simple device, "Bung for Blanktown!" and a warning that "Your beer will cost you more," the conduct of political forces may present some difficulties. Who can say that even "Tariff Reform" has benefited by the Peckham election? We doubt whether the bulk of the men who returned Mr. Gooch to Parliament gave half-an-hour's thought to it, or troubled themselves to understand even the coarser fallacies of its propagandists. The issue was largely focussed on a single personal habit of the people, and was directed by the trade which profits by it. Other forces, bearing similarly on intimate facts in the lives of the very poor—the rise in the price of food, the possibility of a rise in the price of fuel, as the result of a shorter day for a favoured body of fellow-workers far away in the coal-fields of the midlands and the north—worked together in a kind of lime-light electioneering, under which the bewildered inhabitants of mean streets saw the familiar necessities and comforts of their daily lives being visibly snatched away from them. The moral of such a contest is psychological as well as political. To great masses of people, only the simplest, barest statements, or mis-statements, of fact, pictorially and dramatically set forth, appeal. They cannot think things out. When, at long intervals, they are brought to consider political questions, the hard drive of daily experience, the need for cheap food, the fear of unemployment and old age, the rent, the evening gossip at the public-house bar, obviously bulk largely in such judgment as they are able to exercise. It is not surprising, therefore, that when a threatened interest, strong in its contact with the lives of the poorest, comes down on a constituency like Peckham, with its money, its blatant talk, its selfish fears disguised as cheap morality, its blare of noise and profusion of colour, thousands should be swept off their feet. Such a campaign is too like many of the newspapers they read, the entertainments they frequent, the songs they sing, the catchwords they delight in. Serious folk may weep over such a display, and cynical observers may laugh at it. But it is a factor in modern politics, especially in so feverish and light-minded a community as London, and Liberals and social reformers must make the best and not the worst of it.

We are bound to add that the very worst use that the Liberal Party and the Liberal Government can make of such an event as the Peckham election is to be frightened at it, or so to deflect its policy as to widen the breach between it and the poorer classes of voters. That is certainly not the moral either of the General Election or of the political situation to-day. We won in 1906 on cheap food and social reform. We lost in Peckham on a cry of dear beer, dear fuel, and unemployment. That is no reason for abandoning a just and reasonable measure of social improvement, in which the interests of the workers and of the whole community are deeply concerned. If "the trade" thinks that the Government will capitulate to it at the first skirmish, and allow it to plant its interests in the centre of our political life, it is gravely mistaken. The occasion is one rather for cementing, if possible, the union of religious leaders in the Church and in Nonconformity which the attitude of the Bishops on the Licensing Bill has brought about, for calling on men of good-will to stand together to prevent the depravation of politics, and for asking the Labour Party to remember that the spirit and the forces that prevailed at Peckham are not less hostile to them than to the Government, and will be used to dissipate or weaken their movement at the General Election. But to talk, as, for example, the chief Liberal Whip talks, as if Socialism were the enemy, when, as a matter of fact, the peril is plainly revealed to be the too great power of wealth in this country, and the too weak resistance of the people to its influence, is to go straight against the signs of the times. Much that the Government proposes stands aloof from average working class experience, or only touches it by interfering, for purposes of the public good, with its prejudices or its routine. And on other questions, such as unemployment, its tone has been far too negative.

Happily, there is one point in its programme which closely touches such issues as were raised in the Peckham election, and that is old-age pensions. Here is something tangible, something that goes to the heart of working-class experience, and appeals not only to the compunction of the well-to-do classes, but also to the most pathetic need, the most melancholy and irretrievable failure, in the civilised State. Those who have surveyed the working of the system of pensions in New Zealand testify to the instant effect it produces on the imaginations of the work-people. It operates both as a sensible relief of wages, and as a sign that the State has some care and thought for its humbler servants. Some such softening and ameliorating influence is especially desirable at a moment when the Government has to defend a scheme like the Licensing Bill. That measure should greatly raise the standard of working-class comfort and self-respect. But it may easily be misrepresented as an undue interference with personal habit, and these descriptions of it, coming from thousands of public-house keepers, compelled to obey the orders of "the trade," have their weight. The people have therefore to learn that this measure proceeds from friends anxious to redeem the large promises made at the election of 1906, and acquainted with the deeper anxieties of the workman's life. Even the Peckham election, with all its perversity, shows that a party which means, if it wins, to cut down the purchasing power of wages will be overthrown as soon as it is found out. If the Government can effectually dramatise the capital point of their social policy, Protection may never get its chance.

THE LAST OF THE CONSERVATIVES.

WE shall not pay the late Duke of Devonshire the conventional tribute of saying that he was a great Liberal statesman, and that the party of progress in politics is the poorer by his death. "Was he ever a Liberal?"

Gladstone, his master and, happily, his successful rival, once asked of him, and it argues little comprehension of the Duke's eminence and public usefulness to assign to him qualities and opinions which he did not possess. For a good part of his career he was in nominal union with the Liberal Party; for another long period he was actively dissociated from it; for a short closing phase he was reunited with it on the single issue of Free Trade. But in all these aspects of his public life, he remained essentially the same man, maintaining a consistent attitude. In the Liberal Opposition of the late seventies, he stood as the moderating force to Gladstone's personality and humanitarian sympathies. Had the party willed it, he would, quite properly, and with no breach of personal loyalty to his old chief, have assumed the lead of the Government of 1880. In that Government he was the steady foil to Mr. Chamberlain's democracy, resisting not merely Home Rule, but the moderate and plausible compromise of a National Irish Board. In the third period he accepted, in alliance with the organised mass of Conservative voters, just so much of Tory democracy as would suffice to kill Home Rule and stay the Radical advance. When this phase of British politics was thoroughly worked out, and Imperialism began to wane, the Duke again stood in the breach to avert a quick change to a Protectionist State, called for by the statesman whom he most disliked and distrusted. Such a record makes a singularly well-rounded career, firmly and truthfully conceived. But it is the career not of a Liberal, but of a Conservative, perhaps of the last of our Conservative statesmen. Each step in it was consistent with its predecessor. The Duke of Devonshire began and ended as a Unionist Free Trader; above all, as a Moderate, holding to fixed points in his creed, interpreting them literally and without bigotry, but also without imagination. In this steadfastness and simplicity of view he was distinguished from all his contemporaries, from Gladstone, the humanitarian; from Chamberlain and Churchill, the demagogues; from Salisbury and Mr. Balfour, at once reactionary and opportunist.

The Duke of Devonshire's career is a remarkable example of the way in which our aristocratic system tempers the course of British politics. It is impossible to say that the Duke was a man of great intellect; it was possible to hear his worst speeches, though not his best, and to conclude that his endowment was small. But we quite understand Mr. Balfour when he says the Duke of Devonshire was the most persuasive speaker he had ever heard. It would be hard to determine what part of this quality of persuasiveness was due to force of character and integrity of mind, and what he owed to his great wealth and his position as the head of a family long connected with the ancient art of politics, and to the self-confidence and self-respect, the long start on the spacious ways of life, that such an association secures. No other modern country owns such an aristocracy, or now puts it to such uses. Is it an asset to be despised? Were there not moments, for example, when it was very fortunate that the country possessed an aristocrat like the Duke of Devonshire as a make-weight to "men of the age," of the type of Mr. Chamberlain? Would not France and the United States, for example, be glad to possess such a type, and to draw on it in periods of instability in their national life? There is something to be said for this view. Old countries look to leaders from the old types and families, and will take from them what they will not accept from younger growths. But we doubt whether on the whole democracy benefits by them. With all his individuality of view and personality, the Duke of Devonshire did a good deal of quiet obstruction of progress. He stopped the settlement of Ireland. He greatly delayed the shaping of the old Whig-Liberal Party into an efficient instrument of democracy. His personal leadership of that party was singularly unfruitful. It promised no advance in conceptions of international politics which Gladstone secured. It was entirely indifferent to social questions, and must have ended, had it been prolonged, in a complete severance of the two wings of the party, or in an early and triumphant rise of Socialism.

The Duke of Devonshire's best contribution to our politics was, indeed, that which derived directly from his character. This was simple and honest, and it was joined to a good, if slow, intellect. He did not shine as a man of action in the emergencies in which quicker minds like Gladstone (whose conversation he "could not understand"), Mr. Chamberlain, and Mr. Balfour sometimes plunged him. He took time to think, and the event flowed past him. But when he recovered the full use of his powers, he became a formidable, massive, and determined opponent. During the Free Trade controversy, the full value of an intelligence that would not, and, indeed, could not, be hurried or coerced was apparent. Steadiness in a sensational time serves the business of fair and right Government. Mr. Balfour truly said that the processes of the Duke's mind, which was singularly candid, were discernible in his speech, and gave a marked impression of his sincerity. This was the secret of his considerable moral force with his countrymen. Not without a tinge of class selfishness, he could also think and feel for the nation as a whole, and could thus justify its belief in the honesty and public spirit of its leaders. He was, indeed, close to a phase of its mind, and was, as many have called him, a rather typical Englishman. He comforted the slow and the timid, and kept them attached, even loosely, to a form of Liberalism. He had conscience, and at three decisive periods of his life he kept his ambition, which was not inconsiderable, in marked subordination to his view of the public interest. As he saw truth he pursued it. It is only when we compare his figure with that of the leaders of mankind, even in the devious course of political action, with Lincoln, with Cavour, with Cobden, Gladstone, or even Peel, that we are sensible of the want of imagination which, as we sum up his character and life, fix him in a rank behind that of the greatest. No powerful mind conceives a society like ours as stable or as insusceptible of large, even of vital, change. The Duke of Devonshire stood as still as he could in a world that moved rather fast.

THE REBELLION OF NATAL.

No one acquainted with the ways of Natal politicians will feel surprised that Mr. Moor, the Premier, should designate questions put by members of the Imperial Government relating to the extraordinary state of affairs in that Colony as "damnable interference." But it is full time to realise the strange and unprecedented constitutional doctrine which underlies the recent conduct and claims of the Ministry of this self-governing Colony.

Last September the Natal Government, alleging that Dinizulu, the paramount chief, was engaged in fomenting rebellion, applied for the use of Imperial troops to assist in arresting him, and in repressing the resistance which, they asserted, was likely to be offered by the Zulu tribes. Lord Elgin, holding that no sufficient case for armed repression was made out, refused Imperial troops. At the beginning of December, however, the Governor, urged by his Ministers, proclaimed martial law in Zululand and North Natal, and moved up Colonial troops. Dinizulu, who had never shown the least intention to resist, and who, quite recently, had submitted of his own accord to an informal investigation, surrendered at once, and no single action on the part of Zulu chiefs sustained the charges brought against them. It is not alleged that any resistance was anywhere encountered, in spite of the provocation afforded by the removal of Dinizulu by armed forces. But, though no state of warfare arose, martial law was maintained, a number of arrests were made, many natives were flogged, and other acts of violence were perpetrated. Only last week Cakojana, against whom lies a charge of complicity with murder, and who had surrendered voluntarily at Pietermaritzburg, was sent back into the area of martial law to be subjected to the brutality and illegality of a court-martial. Dinizulu, who, on the urgent representations of the Imperial Government, was to be allowed a trial in the ordinary court, has been precluded from preparing his defence by the refusal of the Government to allow his legal representative free access to documentary and other evidence inside the area of martial law.

More serious, however, is the recent announcement of Mr. Moor that the Ministry intend to retain martial law until the Natal Parliament has met and an Act of Indemnity has been passed. This Act they will then remit to the Imperial Government, claiming a formal ratification, as they did two years ago. It is in the light of this avowed intention that we must read the language of Mr. Moor about "damnable interference." If the Natal contention is correct, a self-governing Colony is free at any time to throw off all those restraints and guarantees of order and justice imposed and accepted in her Constitution, and to revert to the methods of military anarchy, calling upon the Imperial Government to endorse, as a mere matter of form, the legal whitewash which the Colonial Legislature is compelled to give. Were the Imperial Government to accept this view, no security for life or property would remain for the subject race. For example, it was provided in the Annexation Act of 1897, by which Zululand passed under the control of Natal, that no grants of land should be made without the approval of the Crown. But if no limits are set upon the illegalities under martial law which a self-governing Colony is permitted to include in its indemnity, what is there to prevent the use of this convenient instrument to promote the land-grabbing policy which in Natal, as elsewhere, underlies so much of the native policy? In a word, it is impossible for the Imperial Government to accept the view of Mr. Moor without abrogating entirely the responsibility of Empire. If Lord Elgin is correct in holding that in the declaration of martial law the Governor of a self-governing Colony is bound to act on the advice of his Ministers, this serves only to throw into stronger relief the responsibility of the Imperial Government in the ratification of the Act of Indemnity. It is to this action that the questions in our House of Commons are directed. But it is abundantly clear that no such questions will serve to enable our Government intelligently to perform its duty of learning the meaning of the Act it will be called upon to ratify. At present all specific questions put by our Government to the Natal Ministry are treated with contumely. Why not? Two years ago a "bogus" rising, repressed with immense slaughter and gross barbarities, was taken quietly over here, and the testimony of the actors as to the necessity of the crimes committed under martial law was accepted without cross-examination. Why not a second time? The Natal theory that martial law is to continue, not as long as the internal conditions of disorder which justify it, but until all the acts involved are duly legalised, is, of course, fatal to any intelligent endorsement on the part of the Imperial Government. For, as the case of 1906 shows, the whole period of the operation of martial law can never come within the purview of the Imperial Government. After the Natal Government had passed the Act of Indemnity and sent it over here, they still claimed to apply martial law, and did, in fact, try and condemn the Zulu chief Tilonko under this procedure. In a word, the claim of Mr. Moor amounts to this—that Natal shall be at liberty to declare and to maintain a state of anarchy just as long as she likes, and still, after issuing an Act of legislation, both retrospective and prospective, ask our Government to sign it blindfold.

Now we do not hesitate to describe this as a monstrous proposal. We urge the Imperial Government to lose no further time in making it quite clear to the Natal Ministers that they will not be guilty of any such dereliction of a plain Imperial duty, and that before signing any Act of Indemnity they will insist upon a full and impartial inquiry into the necessity of the original declaration of martial law, its continuance over so long a period, and the operations during the whole time it remains in force. The Natal Government should be given to understand that, until the report of this impartial inquiry has been received and considered, our Government will not consider the question of ratifying an Act of Indemnity; and the Governor should be urged to represent to his Ministers the propriety of postponing the trial of Dinizulu until this inquiry, which would open up large tracts of evidence relevant to this trial, has been completed.

The recurrence of these disorders in Natal and Zululand, and our total inability to extract from the Colonial Government any sufficient explanation of them, render the immediate appointment of an Imperial Commission of inquiry a matter of grave urgency. The experiment of granting full self-government to a Colony where 22,000 white electors control the destinies of more than a million coloured people was precarious from the outset. These repeated confessions of her inability to apply the ordinary methods of civilised government would warrant the Imperial Government in reconsidering the advisability of leaving the country to the mercy of a Constitution which, on the acknowledgment of those responsible for working it, so frequently breaks down.

THE END OF A WAR-SCARE.

It is at last possible to speak of the friction between the United States and Japan in the past tense. The Japanese Government, with diplomatic magnanimity, has addressed, and the United States Government has not less wisely accepted, an invitation to the American fleet to visit Tokio. Thus happily ends a disagreement which, during the last eighteen months, has sent more than one disquieting shiver through East and West alike. The forebodings which greeted the voyage of the American fleet to the Pacific were not solely of American origin. If they had been, it would have been easy to dismiss them. The Americans have not yet matured to the point of discussing their external problems with the moderation which is one of the marks of moral self-possession. There is, indeed, no subject that excites them so quickly to outbursts of hysteria and unreason. But in this case Europe, too, watched the developments of the dispute between Washington and Tokio with an unmistakable nervousness, and was not unnaturally inclined to read into the sudden transfer to the Pacific of practically the whole of American sea-power something more than a mere warning of sinister possibilities. These apprehensions were never, perhaps, quite warranted by a cool study of the facts. To begin with, it could not be said that the voyage of the American fleet had an exclusive connection with the issue between the Japanese and American Governments. To regard it, indeed, in that light is to miss a good part of its significance. Its true explanation is to be sought in the extraordinary changes that within the last decade have depressed the Atlantic and correspondingly elevated the Pacific in the balance of America's political interests. Since the expulsion of Spain from Cuba and Porto Rico, since the happy revolution in Anglo-American sentiment, and since the growth of the American navy has rendered the Monroe Doctrine virtually unassailable, it is scarcely too much to say that the menace of war has been dissipated along the whole length of the Atlantic seaboard. But simultaneously with this appeasement of their more pressing anxieties in the ocean that washes their Eastern States, the Americans have acquired a new set of interests and responsibilities in the Pacific. They have annexed Hawaii; they have bought the Philippines; they have taken a stake in the destinies of China; they have found in the Orient markets whose value they are inclined, if anything, to over-estimate; and they have felt the reflex action upon their commercial and political interests of the swift march of Japan to the hegemony of Asia. It was inevitable that these developments should sooner or later react upon the distribution of American sea-power. The United States could not indefinitely continue to accumulate interests in one ocean while her fleet remained stationed in another.

We take, therefore, the cruise of the American battleships to be at bottom a consequence of the events which have transformed the United States into a Far Eastern Power and have accustomed her people, always ready to expand their notions of world-policy, to think that their external problems embrace both oceans, and that their trade, possessions, and prestige demand, in the Pacific, as well as in the Atlantic, the visible guarantee of the nation's willingness and ability to protect them. The event has justified those who argued that the voyage of the fleet, with its ultimate implication of a powerful and permanent squadron in the waters of the Pacific, should be considered apart from the issue of Japanese immigration. Whether it would not have been better to postpone it to a period when it was less liable to be misinterpreted is still, however, another question. We think ourselves it would, but it is clear that among the many influences that have urged the United States to assert herself in the Pacific, the immigration difficulty cannot claim an exclusive place. Moreover, the dispute itself, so far as it concerns the United States and Japan, has at no time been really crucial. It has been complicated by injudicious handling at Washington, by the intricacies of the American political system, and by the hectoring heedlessness of American journalists and politicians; and it has taken on a certain importance as part of a far wider problem which will undoubtedly one day demand the best thought that East and West can give it. But taken by itself, it was never of sufficient gravity to justify talk of war. The Governments of the United States and Japan soon came to see eye to eye on the fundamental point at issue. That is to say, both countries, though for different reasons, were equally desirous of reducing Japanese immigration into America to the lowest possible figure. The Americans do not want it at all, and the Japanese want to divert it to their spheres of influence on the Asiatic mainland. The Mikado's Government undertook some months ago to deflect the stream of emigration away from California. The American Congress, less courteously and with doubtful legality, empowered the President to forbid the passage of Japanese labourers from Hawaii, Mexico, Canada, and the Panama zone to the United States proper. It is true that these expedients may fail to achieve the desired result, and that a more drastic and, no doubt, a more offensive remedy may have to be sought. But nothing can alter the fact that the difference between the two Governments is in reality not one of aim but of means and manners.

Within the limits of this difference, however, there is still room for a certain amount of friction and ill-will. We may fairly postulate it as one of the fixed elements of the situation that the Americans are bent upon excluding Japanese labourers from their shores. If the restrictions on emigration voluntarily imposed by the Mikado's Government prove effective, well and good. But they are highly unpopular in Japan, and, we should say, very difficult to enforce. In the event of their breakdown, the Americans will probably have recourse either to a Treaty or an Act of Congress. To a Treaty, Japan, on the score of dignity and of existing rights, will not agree; and a discriminatory Act of Congress she will undoubtedly, and with reason, resent. But there is a wide gap between resentment and war. The worst, we think, that can happen is that the arrival of the battleships off San Francisco may powerfully stimulate the anti-Orientalism of the Pacific States, and that the Californian representatives will press forward, and Congress will ultimately adopt, a measure specifically prohibiting Japanese coolie immigration. But, quite apart from the fact that foreign labourers, and Americans among them, are already excluded from Japan, and that the practical effect of an Exclusion Act would, therefore, be to equalise the policies of the two Governments, the developments we have sketched can hardly result in a rupture of the peace. Japan needs, above all things, a generation of freedom from outside complications. She has enormous tasks on hand in Korea and Manchuria; she has to consolidate her political position in China, to lay the foundations of a vast Oriental trade, and to husband her resources with a frugality of which spend-thrift Europe has almost lost the sense. Is it conceivable that her prudent statesmanship would jeopardise so bright a prospect by plunging into a war in which defeat would mean ruin, while victory would serve no direct national interest—a war waged to compel the United States to receive Japanese immigrants on an equality with whites? Such a conflict may come one day, but not now. Nor are the guarantees of peace less binding on the American side. The first condition of American security in the Pacific is friendship with Japan. Without that friendship not only the Philippines, but the whole future of American commerce in the Far East, are exposed to the peril of a permanent instability.

These are facts which the visit of the fleet to Tokio will pointedly emphasise; and the more clearly they are grasped, the greater becomes the assurance of peace and sanity.

Life and Letters.

COMFORT.

THEY lived in a flat on the fifth floor, facing a private park on one side, and on the other, through the branches of an elm tree, another block of flats as lofty as their own. It was very pleasant living up so high, where they were not disturbed by noises, by scents, or by the sight of other people—except such people as themselves. For, quite unconsciously, they had long found out that it was best not to be obliged to see, or hear, or smell anything that made them feel uncomfortable. In this respect they were not remarkable; nor was their adoption of such an attitude to life unnatural. So will little Arctic animals grow fur that is very thick and white, or pigeons have heads so small and breast feathers so absurdly thick that sportsmen in despair have been known to shoot them in the tail. They were, indeed, in some respects not unlike pigeons, a well-covered and personable couple. In one respect they differed from these birds—they had no wings, they never soared. But they were kindly folk, good to each other, very healthy, and with every wish to do their duty in the station to which they had been called. They had three children, a boy and two little daughters, who were all of them plump, and healthy, and good-looking. And had the world been made up entirely of themselves, their like, and progeny, it would—one felt—have been Utopia.

At eight o'clock each morning, lying in their beds with a little pot of tea between them, they read their letters, selecting first—by that mysterious instinct which makes men keep what is best until the end—those which looked as if they indicated the existence of another side of life. Having glanced at these, they would remark that such and such seemed a deserving sort of charity; that so and so, they were afraid, was hopeless; and it was only yesterday that this subscription had been paid. These evidences of an outer world were not too numerous; for, living in a flat, they had not the worry of rates with their perpetual reminder of social duties, even to the education of other people's children; the hall porter, too, would not let beggars use the lift; and they had set their faces against belonging to societies, of which they felt that there were far too many. They would pass on from letters such as these to read how their boy at school was "well and happy"; how Lady Bugloss would be so glad if they would dine on such a day; and of the awful weather Netta had experienced in the South of France.

Having dispersed, he to the bathroom, she to see if the children had slept well, they would meet again at breakfast, and divide the newspaper. They took a journal which, having studied the art of making people comfortable, when compelled to notice things that had been happening in a cosmic, not a classic, sort of way, did so in a manner to inspire a certain confidence, as who should say: "We, as an organ of free thought and speech, invite you, genteel reader, to observe these little matters with your usual classic eye. That they are always there, we know; but as with meat, the well-done is well-done, and the underdone is underdone—for one to look too closely at the other would be peculiar, not to say subversive of the natural order of the joint. This is why, although we print this matter, we print it in a way that we are sure will enable you to read it in a classic, not a cosmic, spirit."

Having run their eyes over such pieces of intelligence, they turned to things of more immediate interest, the speeches of an Opposition statesman, which showed the man was probably a knave, and certainly a fool; the advertisements of motor cars, for they were seriously thinking of buying one; and a column on that international subject, the cricket match between Australia and the Mother Country. The reviews of books and plays they also read, noting carefully such as promised well, and those that were likely to make them feel uncomfortable. "I think we might go to that, dear; it seems nice," she would say; and he would answer: "Yes! And look here, don't put that novel on the list, I'm not going to read that." Then they would sit silent once again, holding the journal's pages up before their breasts, as though sheltering their hearts. If, by any chance, the journal recommended books which, when read, gave them pain—causing them to see that the world held people who were short of comfort—they were more grieved than angry, for some little time not speaking much, then suddenly asseverating that they did not see the use of making yourself miserable over dismal, sordid matters; it was sad, but everybody had their troubles, and if one looked into things, one almost always found that the sufferings of others were really their own fault. But their journal seldom failed them, and they seldom failed their journal; and whether they had made it what it was, or it had made them what they were, was one of those things no man knows.

They sat at right angles at the breakfast table, and when they glanced up at each other's cheeks their looks were kindly and affectionate. "You are a comfort to me, my dear, and I am a comfort to you," those glances said.

Her cheek, in fact, was firm and round, and rather pink, and its strong cheekbone mounted almost to the little dark niche of her grey eye. Her hair, which had a sheen as though the sun were always falling on it, seemed to caress the top curve of her clean pink ear. There was just the suspicion of a chin beneath her rounded jaw. His cheek was not so strong and moulded; it was flat, and coloured reddish brown, with a small shining patch of special shaving just below the side growth of his hair, clipped close in to the top lobe of the ear. The bristly wing of his moustache showed sandy-brown above the corner of his lips, whose fullness was compressed. About that side view of his face there was the faintest suggestion that his appetites might some day get the better of his comfort.

Having finished breakfast they would separate; he to his vocation, she to her shopping and her calls. Their pursuit of these was marked by a direct and grave simplicity, a sort of genius for deciding what they should avoid, a real knowledge of what they wanted, and a certain power of getting it. They met again at dinner, and would recount all they had done throughout that busy day: What risks he had taken at Lloyd's, where he was an underwriter; how she had ordered a skirt, been to a picture-gallery, and seen a Royal Personage; how he had looked in at Tattersall's about the boy's pony for the holidays; how she had interviewed three cooks without result. It was a pleasant thing to hear that talk, with its comfortable, home-like flavour, and its touching reliance on a real sympathy and understanding of each other.

Every now and then they would come home indignant or distressed, having seen a lost dog, or a horse dead from heat or overwork. They were peculiarly affected by the sufferings of animals; and covering her pink ears, she would cry: "Oh, Dick! how horrible!" or he would say: "Damn! Don't rub it in, old girl!" If they had seen any human being in distress, they rarely mentioned, or, indeed, remembered it, partly because it was such a common sight, partly because their instincts reasoned thus: "If I once begin to see what is happening before my eyes all day, and every day, I shall either feel uncomfortable and be compelled to give time and sympathy and money, and do harm into the bargain, destroying people's independence; or I shall become cynical, which is repulsive. But, if I stay in my own garden—as it were—and never look outside, I shall not see what is happening, and if I do not see, it will be as if there were nothing there to see!" Deeper still than this, no doubt, they had an instinctive knowledge that they were the fittest persons in the State. They did not follow out this feeling in terms of reasoning, but they must have dimly understood that it was because their fathers, themselves, and children, had all lived in comfort, and that if they once began diminishing that comfort they would become nervous, and deteriorate. This deep instinct, for which Nature was responsible, made them feel that it was no real use to concern themselves with anything that did not help to preserve their comfort, and the comfort of those they were likely to be breeding from, to a degree that would ensure their nerves and their perceptions being coated, so that they literally could not see. It made them feel—with a splendid subtlety which kept them quite unconscious—that this was their duty to Nature, to themselves, and to the State.

Seated at dinner, they were more than ever like two pigeons, when those comfortable, home-like birds are seen close together on a lawn, looking at each other between the movements of their necks towards the food before them. And suddenly, pausing perhaps with sweetbread on his fork, he would fix his round light eyes on the bowl of flowers before him, and say: "I saw Helen to-day, looking as thin as a lath; she simply wears herself to death working down there. Such a pity! She'd be quite good-looking!"

When they had finished eating they would go downstairs, and, summoning a cab, be driven to the play. On the way, they looked straight before them, digesting their food. In the streets the lamplight whitened the wet pavements, and the wind blew impartially on starved faces, and faces like their own. Turning to him a little suddenly, she would murmur: "I can't make up my mind, dear, whether to get the children's summer suits at once, or wait till after Easter." When he had answered, there would again be silence. And as the cab turned into a by-street, a woman, with a shawl over her head and a baby in her arms, would pass, perhaps, just before the horse's nose, and turning her deathly face, mutter an imprecation. Throwing out the end of his cigar, he would say quietly: "Look here, if we're not going abroad this year, you know, it's time I looked out for a fishing up in Skye." Then, recovering the main thoroughfare, they would reach their destination.

The theatre had for them a strange attraction. They exulted beneath its roof a peculiar sense of rest, like some man-at-arms would feel in the old days when, putting off his armour, he stretched his feet out in the evening to the fire. It was a double process that produced in them this feeling of repose. They must have had a dim suspicion that they had been going about all day in armour; they must have known that here, and here alone, they would be really safe against gaunt realities, and naked truths; they must have felt that nothing here could possibly assail their comfort, since the commercial value of the piece depended on its pleasing them. Everything would therefore be presented in a classic, not a cosmic, spirit, suitable to people of their status. Dimly they must have felt all this; but that was only half the process which wrought in them this sense of ease. For, seated side by side, their attentive eyes fixed on the stage, the delightful thrill of "seeing life" would come; and this "life"—that was so far removed from life—seemed to bring to them a blessed absolution from all need to look on it in other forms.

And they would come out, subtly inspired, secretly strengthened. And whether the play had made them what they were, or they had made the play, was another of those things that no man knows. Their spiritual exaltation would take them to their Mansions, and elevate them till they reached their door.

But when—seldom, luckily—their Journal was at fault, and they found themselves confronted with a play subversive of their comfort, their faces, at first attentive, would grow a little puzzled, then hurt, and lastly angry; and they would turn to each other, as though by exchanging anger they could minimise the harm that they were suffering. She would say in a loud whisper: "I think it's a perfectly disgusting play!" and he would answer: "So dull—that's what I complain of!"

After a play like this they talked a good deal in the cab on the way home, of anything except the play, as though sending it to Coventry; but every now and then a queer silence would fall between them. He would break it by clucking his tongue against his palate, remarking: "That play's left a beastly taste in my mouth!" And she, with her arms folded on her breast, would give herself a little hug of comfort. They felt how unfairly this play had taken them to see it. So wonderful their instinct for keeping harmful things away, so beautifully thick the feathers on their breasts!

On evenings such as this, before going to their room, they would steal into the nursery—she in advance, he following as if it were queer of him—and, standing side by side, watch their little daughters sleeping. The pallid radiance of the night-light fell on the little beds, and on those small forms so confidently quiet; it fell, too, on their own watching faces, and showed the faintly smiling, soft, proud look about her lips, over the feathered collar of her cloak; showed his face, above the whiteness of his shirt front, ruddy, almost shining, craning forward with a little, pleased, and puzzled grin, which seemed to say: "They're rather sweet; how the devil did I come to have them?"

So, often, must two pigeons have stood, looking at their round, soft, grey-white young! Then, turning, they would touch each other's arms and point out a tiny hand crumpled together on the pillow, or a little mouth pouting at sleep, and steal away on tiptoe.

In their own room, standing a minute at the window, they inhaled the fresh night air, with a reviving sense of comfort. Out there, the moonlight silvered the ragged branches of the elm tree, the dark block of Mansions opposite—what else it silvered in the town, they fortunately could not see!

JOHN GALSWORTHY.

THE NEW ELECTIONEERING.

Two separate elements are responsible for the new electioneering. The one is the presence of the city crowd—especially the London city crowd—which cares far more for fun and excitement than for political principles. The other is the plunge into the electoral struggle of all kinds of adventitious agencies, fomenting enthusiasm for their own causes, either as a means of directly influencing the actual contest, or as occupying a fruitful field for propagandism. The result of the two combined was the conversion of a respectable London suburb into a delirium. Peckham for a week became pandemonium. We have laughed in good-natured contempt at the methods of electioneering adopted in America, where the political differences between Republican and Democrat have almost ceased to exist, but where concerted howlings and yelpings, Bengal lights and fireworks, prolonged cheering, maintained for two hours without a break, and every evidence of an organised hysteria are utilised as arts for the triumph of one side or the other. Much the same psychological influences are being exercised in the electioneering crowd to-day. For this week of frantic demonstrations every evening an appreciable percentage of London's four million inhabitants poured into the streets of Peckham. They surged up and down the narrow ways, chaffing each other, cheering the candidates, keen, alert, glad each to find himself in the heart of a London crowd. Any man or woman upon whom fell the itch of speech secured a box, mounted on it, held forth to those who would listen, on teetotalism, or vaccination, or the wickedness of the Government, or the variable price of beer. And the crowd listened, as it may be seen listening to any distorted nonsense in the public parks on Sunday afternoons: with an aspect of intense seriousness, the respect which the inarticulate Englishman instinctively feels for the voluble. Party feeling was supposed to run high, the newspapers on each side called shrilly for the defeat of plunderers and miscreants; "'Thou shalt not steal,' there is no time limit to that," in huge letters, stretched across the street, challenged the cries from Liberal placards that unless the people strangled the drink monopoly they would be strangled by it.

Yet it seemed that the great mass of this astonishing aggregation—the good-tempered, short-sighted happy-go-lucky London working-man—regarded all such fiery invective with fortitude, if not with indifference. He was out for fun: to hear a little politics, though not too much; speakers who attempted argument or quotation were speedily deserted; what he liked was noisy rhetoric and denunciation. "Give it 'em hot!" was his favourite advice to any speaker of either colour. He delighted in quick repartee, the ready scoring off an interruptor, the good telling of some story with a very obvious point at the end. He liked to see the coal carts wading through the crowded streets, with the big and little sacks of coal; and the so-called procession of the unemployed from Woolwich, actual, tangible figures, visible before his very eyes; and the huge painted donkey, half as high again as himself, bearing the legend, "My brother is going to vote for Gautrey;" and the Suffragettes there in person, the very women (some of them agreeable to look at) who had been carried out of Parliament by the police, and done their "time" in Holloway Gaol. He sought above all a new sensation: cheering, now a man who, from the summit of a soap box, proclaimed the approaching end of the world; and now Mr. Hunnab, as he surmised that in the coming University boat race both Oxford and Cambridge will be found in the first three; and now a sad-faced woman, whose contribution to the discussion consisted in ringing a huge dinner bell for half-an-hour without stopping, whose thoughts, like the thoughts of the Turk who followed Anacharsis Cloutz, in the French Convention, "remain conjectural to this hour."

And if the first novelty is this hunger of the city individual for the city tumult, of the inhabitant of each busy drab house, in a multitudinous labyrinth of drab mean streets, for colour, crowd consciousness, and adventure; the second novelty is the sweeping away of the party organisation before outside agencies. In the old days everything else was merged in the struggle between the blue and the yellow. In the historic struggle at Lambeth in 1880, over twenty thousand pounds were spent by both Liberal and Conservative alike. And from this and similar scandals was born the Corrupt Practices Act, which rigidly limited the amount that should be spent on an election. The object of that Act was not (in the first place) to save the pockets of the candidates, or the funds of the Parliamentary parties. It was to guarantee that unlimited command of money should not be permitted to exercise undue influence at election times; that the poor individual or the poorer party should not be swamped under all the indirect methods of exercising influence that money can buy. The system there established has lasted till recently, with some attempt at fair working. It has been gradually breaking down, and at Peckham it finally collapsed. An indiscreet brewery company sent a cheque to Mr. Gooch for his election expenses, which he promptly returned with the intimation that he preferred to pay himself. The saner brewery companies had no difficulty in disposing of their cheques in far more effective fashion. Permanent organisations, standing outside the political parties, swarmed into the constituency—such as the Tariff Reform League, the Free Trade Union, the Temperance Organisations, the Women's Suffrage Societies. But in addition to these, ephemeral organisations sprang up like mushrooms, took upon themselves high-sounding names, dispatched long lines of sandwich-men to parade the streets with terrifying legends on their backs, and ready quick orators, to discourse upon some iniquity or advocacy wherever two or three were gathered together.

So a "Coal Consumers' Defence League," suspiciously resembling the old Municipal Reform Party with their coats turned inside out, asserted, with monotonous insistence, that coal would rise in price if Mr. Gautrey were elected: and attained the hypnotic success which always recompenses a monotonous insistence sufficiently prolonged. And the Brewery Debenture Shareholders' League announced the approaching misery of the widow and the orphan. And long lines of street bookmakers, in tall white hats and genial, vacant, or bibulous faces, inquired of the passing mob why they should not be allowed to bet in the streets if they wished. And every public-house became a Tory committee-room, with all its windows plastered with Tory bills and cartoons, and the evidence of a brisk trade and many conversions within its walls. Outside the Metropolitan Gasworks at the dinner hour, and in Peckham High-street after nightfall, a cloud of mingled, confused oratory and invective rose to the unconscious stars; as six or seven meetings, each within easy earshot of each other, shouted in hoarse accents for women's votes or cheaper food or the rights of the publican. Wagon-loads of pictorial illustration wedged their way through the coagulated masses of South London, now lit with fierce glares of torches, now disguised as an illuminated fire-engine pumping truth upon the Liberal mendacities; now loaded with slum children, looking, it must be confessed, exceedingly happy and healthy, but dolorously labelled "Victims of the Public-house monopoly." Hysteria, as in all such crowded deliriums, was never far away; women shrieked aloud at meetings and had to be removed; madness fell upon a boy of twelve, and he stood on the top of a barrel, talking Tariff Reform. The extraordinary good humour, the extraordinary stupidity, and the extraordinary latent forces, so concealed as to be unknown even to themselves, in these shabby, cheery, inefficient multitudes of bewildered and contented men and women, were the dominant impressions at the conclusion of this gigantic entertainment.

Do they care? Yes, undoubtedly, with, beneath all the love of fun and frolic, a really pathetic desire to know the truth: to understand what really lies behind these fluent orations and facile statistics and all the fury of illustration and argument which has descended upon their inconspicuous abodes. Will they ever know? That is an unanswerable query. There are the knots and gatherings of convinced politicians, who will cheer for Chamberlain or denounce Protection, just as there are the knots and gatherings of convinced religious adherents, who, crystallised out of the huge aggregation of indifference, worship in various forms a God who is unknown to the general. But the physical conditions of the city life are so novel to them, the hustle and violence of it all so insistent, the effect of the mechanical labour, the little leisure, mostly consumed in transit, the grey, similar streets of tiny houses so desolating, that it is hard to stimulate a high political, social, or religious aspiration. They will continue, for the most part, tacking from side to side in blind, uncertain fashion, firmly convinced at one moment that they have solved the secret, firmly convinced a few months afterwards that they have been mistaken, continuing their hurried, uncertain lives with indomitable patience, courage, and hope always for "better times." They will be deluded, and after a time they will recognise their delusion, and be then as readily deluded again. Yet they have a fine loyalty to individuals, when they have really come to trust them. London in politics, as in religion, will only be held and converted by the influence of that individual and personal devotion.

A DANCE OF DEATH.

"THEY describe," says Bagehot of the French memoirs, "a life unsuitable to such a being as man in such a world as the present one: in which there are no high aims, no severe duties, where some precept of morals seems not so much to be sometimes broken as to be generally suspended and forgotten—such a life, in short, as God has never suffered men to lead on the earth long, which He has always crushed out by calamity or revolution." Mr. Upton Sinclair, in his study of the wealthiest society of New York ("The Metropolis," Edward Arnold), depicts a life also "unsuitable to such a being as man," only distinguished from the life which was consumed in the French Revolution, by lack of that wit and grace and polished human intercourse which in part redeemed so selfish and profitless a company. The picture may possess a note of exaggeration: it flares a fierce white light upon a certain society, with no toleration of shadows or half tones: the thing stands ugly, in its pitiless glare, a vision not good to look upon. Yet the essential facts remain. The book could be annotated with references to actual events for each of its main incidents. The picture is only not a caricature, because the life it describes is itself a caricature. The forces which have moulded it have driven it inevitably along certain paths: resistance is useless. Enormous wealth—not only beyond "the dreams of avarice," but in such aggregations of millions as make it inconceivable even to its possessors—have descended upon a tiny group of persons who have exploited the resources of a Continent. The first generation accumulated these great possessions, in a desperate, fierce, hand-to-hand conflict in which strength and cunning triumphed, and polish and pleasantness of manner and kindness counted for nothing at all. To the second generation is given the spending of it. There are no high traditions of social service. There are no feudal or communal responsibilities of social obligation. Charity is resented by the recipient and tiresome to the giver; the founding of Universities becomes too commonplace to attract; settlements are voted drab and unsatisfying; religion has become a plaything. All other avenues being thus closed, there remains but a self-indulgence which in itself breeds satiety, and a frantic competition of luxurious display, which, in its more advanced stages, passes into an actual insanity. The second generation, here, as always, is weaker than its fathers. The fierce will-power which ensured financial success in the most terrific financial struggle that the world has ever seen, has exhausted the capacities of the family lineage. It has been raised on the principle of "doing as one likes." It pursues its dolorous existence through its unreal, fantastic world, in a luxurious expenditure more fantastic and horrible—a veritable "Dance of Death"—than the world has ever known.

Here is Castle Havens. "It had cost three or four millions of dollars, and within the twelve-foot wall which surrounded its grounds lived two world-weary people who dreaded nothing so much as to be left alone." The house had many gables, in the Queen Anne style: from the midst of them shot a Norman tower decorated with Christmas-tree wreaths in white stucco: overlapping this was the dome of a Turkish mosque rising out of this something like a dove-cot: out of that, the slender white steeple of a Methodist country church: on top a statue of Diana. "Has there ever been any insanity in the Havens family?" is the natural query of the visitor, as he gazed at this astonishing erection. All round are the "second generation": Freddie Varden, of whom it was said that "if only he had had a little more brains, he would have been half-witted": women "who boast of never appearing twice in the same gown"; one dreadful personage in Boston who wears each costume once, and then has it solemnly cremated by her butler: women who artificially make themselves barren, because of the inconvenience incidental to motherhood, and lavish their affections upon cats and dogs. "It was the instinct of decoration, perverted by the money-lust." The men are busy making money in order that these idle women may attain supremacy in this mad race for display. The "second generation" are so bored that ever more bizarre amusements are sought to stimulate jaded interest. The one thing they dread is to be left alone. "There was a woman who had her teeth filled with diamonds: and another who was driving a pair of zebras. One heard of monkey dinners and pyjama dinners at Newport, of horseback dinners and vegetable dances in New York." "One would take to slumming and another to sniffing brandy through the nose: one had a table-cover made of woven roses, and another was wearing perfumed flannel at sixteen dollars a yard: one had inaugurated ice-skating in August, and another had started a class for the weekly study of Plato." People's health broke down quickly in face of this furious pursuit of pleasure; then they ate nothing but spinach, or lived on grass, or chewed a mouthful of soup thirty-two times before swallowing it. "There were 'rest cures' and 'water cures,' 'new thought' and 'metaphysical healing' and 'Christian Science.'" The young men were filled with the same delusion as the older women. "Some were killing themselves and other people in automobile races at a hundred and twenty miles an hour." "There was another young millionaire who sat and patiently taught Sunday school, in the presence of a host of reporters: there was another who set up a chain of newspapers all over the country and made war against his class." Behind this appalling second generation there was even the nightmare vision of a third, growing up in the heat of such a chaotic nightmare: a third generation in which there would no longer be even the memories of the early struggles of the first pioneers of great fortunes, to connect them with reality.

That reality it is impossible for these people to apprehend. Newspaper criticisms leave them entirely unmoved. The more unblushing the record of scandals and viciousness and fantastic, distorted luxury in any "society" paper, the more secure its circulation amongst the very people who are assailed. They are indifferent to the onslaughts upon their lives by persons "outside"; they know that these people are not, as a matter of fact, condemning their lives: they are only expressing their discontent at not being "inside." The pauper wants fresh meat instead of canned; the business man wants his thousand a year to become two thousand a year; the anarchist who demands revolution can be bought with a secure guarantee of a steady income. It is a society organised from top to bottom on a "money" basis, a business basis, with everything else as a side show. The men listen to President Roosevelt's fierce words about the Trusts and Corporations: they have no resentment: it is "only Teddy's way": it cheers up the people with the hope that something will be done, while they themselves are secure in the knowledge that everything which can be done is in the control of the money power. When they find a reformer whom they can silence by force, they crush him: if they cannot crush him they purchase him: if he can neither be crushed nor purchased, they ignore him. Religion is easily woven into the scheme of things. The Bishop of London preaches in Wall Street, eloquently urging the business men to regard their wealth as a stewardship for God. So far from resentment, the business men abandon their cut-throat competition for a quarter of an hour, press round the Bishop to shake his hand. "Bishop," they say, "that discourse of yours made me feel real good." Then they return to the Stock Exchange gamble. A prominent preacher is lured over at an immense salary from England to preach to the church of Baptist millionaires. He nerves himself to a great effort and denounces their wealth, their works, and their ways. He expects an outbreak of indignation. He discovers instead a universal congratulation. The millionaires and their wives flock to his church, hoping to hear some more. The receipts of the pew rents double; they talk of raising his salary. The more he denounces, the more they applaud. The experience indeed is common to all similar societies: since the day when the prophet pathetically complained that his listeners crowded to hear him as he denounced their vices, "and so," he declares to himself, "thou art unto them as a very lovely song, of one that hath a pleasant voice and can play well on an instrument."

Only some realities cannot be altogether excluded. Change and Death knock occasionally with gaunt hands and refuse all proffered monetary bribes. Here a frantic millionaire, going blind, offers two million dollars to anyone that can cure him. The high gods remain indifferent to the challenge. Teeth drop out, hair drops off; old age creeps on apace: the wealthiest are trembling at the approach of death. The visitor to "The Metropolis" from the south beholds "a golf course, a little miniature Alps, upon which the richest man in the world pursued his lost health, with armed guards and detectives patrolling the place all day, and a tower with a search-light whereby at night he could flood the grounds with light by pressing a button." Mr. Upton Sinclair, with a touch of genius, refuses the inevitable and oft-repeated contrast of this extraordinary society with the ravenous, starved life of the poor. Instead he shows it sharply judged and condemned by the battles of the Wilderness of forty years before: with multitudes of blue-clad and grey-clad soldiers going gladly to their death, for the sake of a Cause, a Hope, and a Vision.

WARRIORS OF SPRING.

THE annual tilting of the planet now makes our part of it greener every day, but a close examination shows that, so far, it is from the point of view of cow or rabbit, snail or caterpillar, largely a delusive greenness. The very early flowers either come up without leaves at all, or have their leaves in some way or other protected from the attentions of the four-footed and other vegetarians. The former plan makes the floral display wonderfully effective, as testify our railway embankments, even within the limits of London proper. They are strewn with the pale gold of colt's-foot, as though the nearly bladeless gravel had received a shower of tiny stars from heaven during the night. The colt's-foot bloom has nothing to fear from the hunger of mortal enemies, but its stalk and floral envelope are covered elaborately with a thick down, well calculated to preserve them from the violent alternations between mid-day sunniness and the frost of midnight. The same can be said of the first leaves of the yellow mullein now crowding round the tall bare spikes that lit candles on the embankment last summer. Thicker felt you cannot find in Nature than the spring leaves of "Adam's flannel," though you will see that, as summer advances, the plant proceeds to put on something a little more like summer clothing.

What traveller has not noticed that most railway embankments are more blessed with flowers than the fields lying just behind them? We are more forced than ever to see this in these early days of spring. Besides the colt's-foot the more generous suns of the dandelion are here strewn thickly, though the children in the village have scarcely found their first blossom. And all manner of green mounds are rising, as fool's parsley, gout weed, and other luscious things come shooting up as they dare not do in the field. The well-drained slope no doubt suits them well; but there is no doubt, also, that a long immunity from grazing is largely to account for the precocity of these ribbon-like areas piercing England in all directions. When summer has come, the fool's parsley will stretch yards into the field, whence it will sweep in a foaming wave almost to the top of the rose-canopied hedge. But just now, not a fern-like leaf is showing beyond the shelter of the clawed blackberry briars or the sturdy, bayoneted blackthorns. The same phenomenon presents itself both on the south side of the hedge and on the north, whence we may conclude that it is not only climatic shelter that is to account for this partiality. The roots that lie out in the field are the inheritors of an experience that taught that it is not worth while coming up till there is plenty of grass to offer better attraction than parsley for the cattle that inhabit the region.

Poison is the chief weapon by means of which the early plant preserves its leaves from the hunger of other creatures. Green as the world is, the rabbits are still nibbling the bark of standing or thrown trees, and the cow goes questing among verdure for a sweet bit of last year's grass. As we pass an old wall, we find that some disintegrating force has thrown out of their cranny a bundle of snails, still glued to one another in winter sleep. There is as yet nothing for them to eat in the wood where they revelled last summer. The spurge laurel, not content with rearing its crown of leaves high on a palm-like trunk, has made its leaves and its yellow-green blossoms one of the most poisonous things on the hill. The bright green fountains of the setterwort are equally unwholesome, and advertise the fact in an odorous manner, that has given it the name of "stinking hellebore." But here and there some curious rabbit has sampled the setterwort. Why does it shine like green light through the wood, if it is not to be eaten? We find the place where the rabbit sat on the side towards which the blossoms nod, and where he has dropped every particle of the green-and-purple bell that he had thought to eat. But snails and slugs will eat even poisonous things, as witness the white bites seen on the most potent of fungi in the season of fungi. The blue-bells and daffodils, now spreading their greenery apace, rely on more than mere poisonousness to save them from snails. Their oxalic acid is distributed among the desirable green tissue in the shape of needle-like crystals, capable, if not of breaking the snail's teeth, of piercing the soft parts of its mouth or digestive apparatus. Microscopic as are these raphides, they are formidable enough to cause serious trouble to those engaged in picking daffodils for the market, giving them painful and even disabling sores, though the simple precaution of oiling the hands before work is said to break down the flowers' defence. No plant is better armed in this respect than the wild arum, whose inviting leaves we find unrolling in every corner that the "lords and ladies" love; and no plant can display foliage so intact from the bite of a slug. Yet it was shown by Stahl that snails would greedily devour leaves that had been treated with acetic acid, and the raphides thus dissolved. Our tender lilies, then, must be set down as plants that protect themselves from destruction by means of prickles.

Tender as the young nettles are, there is none but man to hinder them as they spring up among the hard, dry stems of last year. They are at liberty to choose their own time and place, and they elect to begin the year early. These spring things refuse to take the risks that the soft summer blossoms cheerfully face. The game of producing millions that a hundred may survive is all very well for June, but it will not do for March. Even the modest violet, that delights us with its scent, most probably uses the distinction as a means of keeping away something hungry. The primrose, on the other hand, is good eating, as may be seen by adventurous roots nibbled short off. But, numerous as primroses have already become, their numbers are as zero by comparison with what they will be a month hence. It is only the erratic primrose that blossoms before Lady Day, while better protected flowers put out their whole bloom in this blustering month of March.

It is plain that the blackthorn buds are coveted. Each button now nearly open sits behind a long, sharp bayonet, well fitted to guard it from its infancy till the time when it has been succeeded by leaves, and they again by fruit. The fresh leaves of the hawthorn are just as effectually guarded, and in this case we may note that the upper branches, which are beyond the reach of any grazing animal, are far less prickly, and often entirely without spines. Grant Allen noticed the same thing with reference to the holly, and drew from it his strongest conclusion that the prickles of such plants are evolved by the attentions of grazing animals. It was, perhaps, only half the story, but that does not excuse the modern scientist for insisting only on the other half. According to some of them the prickles, which can usually be shown to be modified leaves or branches, are the result of starvation, and are only to be found on plants having dry habits or conditions of growth. Even the water-soldier, that lives up to its neck in water, must, for the purposes of this argument, be written down a xerophyte, a fact that makes the theory sufficiently absurd to prevent it from becoming very popular. We prefer to believe that necessity has taught the blackthorn, the bramble of rose or blackberry, the holly, and others, to protect themselves from the molestation of cattle, by converting a portion of their greenery into spikes and prickles. They preserve their beauty at the point of the sword. Meanwhile, high above their heads, the unprickly elms are one mass of rosy bloom. They and other notable ones are removed by a generous growth from the necessity to fight for the privilege of an early spring.

Fiscal Fallacies.

I.

A TARIFF AS A CURE FOR UNEMPLOYMENT.

AFTER a long period of fumbling, Tariff Reformers seem, judging by Tuesday's debate on Mr. Goulding's motion, to have decided to play unemployment as their trump card. During the controversy of the last five years the assertion that a Protective tariff can secure employment has frequently been made, but so long as trade was good it carried little weight. Now that trade is slack, and threatens to become still slacker, the platform value of the argument "We will give you work," becomes more manifest. If trade keeps bad enough until the General Election (upon this misfortune Tariff Reformers build their hopes), the bitter cry of the unemployed may turn the electoral scale. Such is the sanguine calculation.

Now it is foolish to ignore the plausibility of the appeal which can be made by Protectionists to members of an industry suffering from foreign competition during the period of depression. To tell them, as a Minister was reported to have told an interruptor at Leicester who asked "What about the 2,000 shoe operatives out of work?" that "they would get work again when trade came round," does not meet the requirements of the case. Though Free Traders are correct in maintaining that a tariff cannot increase the aggregate employment of capital and labour, they have not, we think, succeeded in bringing the heavy guns of economic principle on to the field of practical controversy, so as to be effective for action.

Let us state the Tariff Reform case for curing unemployment in its full plausibility, taking for our example a trade which has often figured in this line of argument. Suppose that in this country £10,000,000 represented the annual demand for motor-cars, of which £9,000,000 was spent on cars of British make, and £1,000,000 on French cars, though the British motor-car trade had unemployed plant and labour enough to satisfy the whole of the demand. If a sufficient duty were put upon French cars, the £1,000,000 spent on them would go to buy British cars, and would thus employ the 10 per cent. of unemployed labour in that trade. So urges the Tariff Reformer. To this the Free Trader generally replies by pointing out that, if the importation of French cars were thus stopped, the exportation of £1,000,000 worth of British manufactures, which in the ordinary course of exchange constitute the real payment for the French motor cars, would also be stopped, and so a blow would be struck at our export trade. This is often considered a triumphant reply, and the argument is allowed to lapse. But, if the Tariff Reformer understands his business, as occasionally he does, he will not let it lapse. He will grant the reduction of manufacturing exports, which will result upon the stoppage of the importation of French cars, but he will point out that this does not signify that the British producers of these export goods will be thrown idle. They will continue to produce the same goods as before, but, instead of exchanging them against French cars, they will exchange them against British cars: London workmen, otherwise unemployed, will consume these goods, instead of Paris workmen, that is all. So, as the result of the Tariff, there will be two sets of capital and labour employed in this country, instead of one here and one in France. The net result, he argues, is to transfer a certain amount of unemployment in the motor-car industry from this side of the Channel to the other.

Old though this argument is, when clad in fresh local circumstances it is extremely telling. In considering how it should be answered, we must distinguish the full economic refutation and the refutation which is "available" for platform use. For the real value of this argument to the Tariff Reformer consists in the difficulty imposed upon his adversary in finding a reply simple enough to reach an uninstructed audience. The economic refutation runs thus: If the tariff stops the importation of French cars, it will not simply result in the British buyers buying £1,000,000 worth of British instead of French cars. The tariff will have the effect of raising the price of all British motor cars. This follows from the fact that the total available supply of motor cars is reduced, while the demand is presumed to remain as before. Another way of stating the same fact is to say that, now that the unemployed capital and labour in the British motor-car trade is sucked up into use, the competition of sellers in the trade will be less keen, and so there will be less tendency to cut prices. But the least reflection compels the admission that British prices throughout the trade must rise. Now one or two results must follow. If £10,000,000 is still spent on motor cars, this sum will buy a smaller number of cars than before. In this event the unemployed capital and labour in the trade is not absorbed. If the rise of price of cars amounted to 10 per cent., £10,000,000 would buy no larger number of British cars sold than £9,000,000 bought before, and no unemployed capital and labour would be absorbed. If, on the other hand, a larger sum of money was expended in buying the same number of cars as before, and so full employment was secured in the motor trade, we have to reckon in the effect of withdrawing expenditure upon other commodities in order to increase the expenditure on cars. If £11,000,000, instead of £10,000,000, are now spent in giving full employment in the motor trade, it is evident that the increased employment in this trade is counterbalanced by diminished employment in other trades, for the extra £1,000,000 spent on motor cars means £1,000,000 less spent on other commodities.

In point of fact, the real effect of the tariff would, of course, be a blend of these two results. There would be a rise of price and a shrinkage of demand, and the net result might well be an expenditure of £10,500,000 in buying British cars, at an enhanced price amounting to 5 per cent., thus absorbing half the unemployed capital and labour. This would mean that half the unemployment of the British motor trade had been shifted, not across the Channel, but upon some other British trades, which will suffer from the transfer of expenditure from the goods they made to the motor-car trade. No increase in the total volume of British employment is thus brought about: the real result of the tariff action is to substitute the manufacture of some British motor cars, which ex hypothesi were worse or dearer than those made in France, for some other British manufactures. The net quantity of employment is the same as before, but the amount of commodities it turns out is somewhat reduced.

This is the valid economic answer to the claims of the tariff to cure unemployment. But it is not simple enough for the platform or the short leaflet. For these purposes it is better to admit that, if a tariff could be made for the sole purpose of protecting the motor-car, or any other particular trade, it might cure this particular unemployment. But since a tariff could only operate by raising prices, this would mean that money which would have been spent in other trades is drawn away into the buying of motor cars, thus causing capital and labour in these other trades to become unemployed. These trades will now claim the protection of a tariff, in order to stand on the same footing with the motor car, and by raising their prices will prevent more money being divested from them to buy motor-cars. But since the cure of unemployment in the motor-car trade is dependent on this diversion of demand from other trades, this extension of the tariff invalidates the cure. In other words, the whole plausibility of the Protectionist claim can be shown to rest upon the supposition that the motor-car trade is to be allowed to injure other trades in the country with impunity.

We believe that this argument could be put intelligibly before an audience of average intelligence. It is better than the ordinary answer, which consists in refusing to meet the direct contention of the Tariff Reformer, and in appealing to the fact that the tariff does not secure full employment in Protectionist countries. For the Tariff Reformer, skilled in debate, will not allow the issue to be turned from the concrete instance he has taken to the general situation.

J. A. H.

Contemporaries.

THE CELEBRATION OF GENIUS.

THE week has seen the formation of two distinguished Committees, each to celebrate aright the honour due to genius. We think it is not our hopes alone which tell us that the first object of one Committee is already gained. Outside a very small circle of stonemasons, academic artists, and a millionaire or two, we suppose there is not a human soul who would feel the happier for seeing such a statue as we could erect to Shakespeare, even for £200,000—no human soul who would imagine that such a memorial added to his honour or expressed our admiration. Prince Albert was not a bad sort of man; he was rather emphatically good. But does anyone think better of him for the thing we perpetrated to his memory? Does anyone at sight of it realise with a thrill of emotion that it expresses our national devotion to virtue? Having done our unhappy best in Hyde Park for goodness, we do not wish to repeat the performance in Regent's Park for genius. The suggestion for an immense "Shakespeare Memorial" has faded away almost as soon as it was born, and we believe the Committee which has just been formed to put an end to it, hardly arrives in time for the burial.

We do not blame the learned and artistic people who started the statue scheme. We only call on them to forget the baseless fabric of their vision, and seize the opportunity which they have created for a better purpose. Now that the Censor and the managers allow little but frivolous indecency on our stage, the chance of establishing an independent theatre to carry forward the development of true drama, and to maintain the tradition of our past dramatic greatness is peculiarly opportune. We have long listened to vain demands for a national playhouse. The highest honour we can do to a dramatist is to act his plays; the next highest is to honour his art, to encourage his successors, to give opportunities for progress along the lines he might himself have followed. If the proposal of the Memorialists brought in enough money to build and endow a truly national theatre with these objects, how much happier we should feel, how much more truly we should be honouring Shakespeare's spirit, than if we burdened the soil of London with another depressing monument!

The other Committee of which we spoke has been formed to honour a kind of genius as unlike Shakespeare's as Russia is unlike our country. We need not follow the contrast; it is shown in every phase of life, every form of expression, except in the one gift of supreme creative power common to Shakespeare and Tolstoy. But if you want an instance, take the historic record. In Shakespeare's time, the whole world known to him was cleft by religious divisions that disturbed or directed the existence of households and empires alike. Yet in all Shakespeare's works there is hardly a hint of any such divisions, and we believe both Catholics and Protestants might claim him as their own with exactly equal absurdity.

Very different is it with the rugged and prophetic personality who this year reaches his eightieth birthday on the Central Russian plains. In the great controversies of our age, he has allowed no one ever to doubt on which side he stands. He abides our question. The whole world may know the intimacy of his spirit. Far from standing aloof as the spectator of time and existence, he himself still strives in the centre of the contending hosts, battered with conflict, steadfast in the faith of victory. Against him have long been ranged all the powers of Empire and State, of autocrats and priests, of capitalists, landowners, and soldiers. One by one, and all combined, he has defied them. In childlike sincerity, strangely armed with worldly knowledge and uncompromising reason, he has stood there for the cause of the poor, for the unperverted man, and the simple-hearted goodness to which all hearts smile in return.

It sounds rather gentle—a little soft, perhaps. When the poor and goodness are coupled together, people feel comfortably secure, and think of philanthropists—a comfortable thought. But from Tolstoy they will not get that comfort. We suppose him to be about the most uncomfortable writer that ever wrote, just as he is now the chief rebel in the world. He, too, came to bring not peace on earth, but a sword. With the sword he has struck not only official authority but ordinary custom to the heart—and no one is comfortable while authority and custom are in death agony. It is true that in the present revolution in Russia Tolstoy has few followers and no party. The time has called out other weapons than his. But if despotism had been wise, if it had not been deterred by the great writer's fame throughout Europe, it is Tolstoy whom it would have hanged long ago or dropped into Siberia, far rather than the preachers of barricades or the organisers of assassination. For no single man has done more to tear away the superstition that hedges authority, and to expose the imbecility of official grandeur.

But it is not only the common idea of the State that this peaceful Anarchist has shattered; his examination into the ordinary habits of life has been far more disturbing to the ordinary man. With that imperturbable sincerity and logic of his, he looks into just the commonest things of the time and reveals their contrasts of horror and human nature. He looks into the police-court, the brothel, the gaol, the ordinary marriage, the average man's sick-room, and he shows us below the surface all the longings and sorrows, the constraints and despairing hopes of the human spirit. Under his guidance we cannot enter upon the simplest scenes of day and night without a new sense of awe and overwhelming pity for the heart of mortal things. To read the trial scene in "Resurrection," or Anna's visit to her little son, or to see Levin beside his drunken brother's bed, or hear Ivan Ilyitch in his lonely sickness asking himself, "What for? What for? Life surely cannot have been so senseless, so loathsome!"—these things come like revelations of the depths of sorrow and holiness lying hidden in the commonplace. We can never again approach such scenes in the same calm spirit of indifference. Custom, that horny shield of existence, has been pierced, and the new realisation holds us in torment. In regard to the poor, it is bad. We could bear it with equanimity when, now and again, Shakespeare, in beautiful words, told us of their houseless heads and unfed sides, their loop'd and window'd raggedness. But Tolstoy has made the picture of the poor hardly endurable for human pity. In regard to the poor it is bad, but it is worse when he comes to pictures of ourselves.

A common distinction is made between Tolstoy the artist and Tolstoy the prophet, and people will draw a line almost at the year when his works cease or begin to interest them, because they are no longer art. It is true that this great writer has not always used the same form; it is seldom that great writers do. But the essential qualities of his power have been the same from his first page up to now, and the basis of his teaching has never altered. By his essential qualities we mean imaginative sympathy and that penetrating sincerity which Goethe identified with genius. It is true that in his later works we are more conscious of the remorseless consistency, the rather inhuman logic with which he drives us on from a readily accepted Christian premiss to a conclusion far less acceptable to our common frailty. But the teaching is, in reality, exactly the same as the profound sense of destiny and judgment which gives so grave a seriousness to all the brilliant and varied life depicted in "Anna Karénina" or "War and Peace." In any celebration for Tolstoy's honour, this identity of principle as the basis of all his works must be remembered, and we look to the Committees of our own and other countries to maintain a reasonable catholicity in their difficult task, neither rejecting the artists as merely literary nor despising the reformers as faddists and cranks. If inspired by a single spirit of sincerity like Tolstoy's, it would be hard to say whether art or conduct has the finer power on mankind.

Art.

MR. BRANGWYN'S EXHIBITION.

CONSIDERING the important position he holds in the art world, Mr. Frank Brangwyn is not a prolific exhibitor of pictures. He is known chiefly as a painter of decorative panels for public buildings. People who stay away from picture-galleries on principle know him through the panels at the Royal Exchange. In the decoration of other important architecture throughout the country he has made his mark by an individuality of style that defies forgetfulness and induces respect. He is one of the very few artists who have found in this direction a suitable and sufficiently wide opportunity for their talent. This fact and the comparative rarity of his appearances at London exhibitions enhance the interest of the show that has been organised by the Fine Art Society. A good one-man show by a good painter is always interesting; when to that can be added the charm of comparative novelty, it becomes more interesting still. The collection in New Bond Street is very complete. There are cabinet pictures and etchings, old and new. A couple of panels, which formed part of the decoration for the British Room at the International Exhibition held in Venice last year, represent his architectural phase. The whole is discreetly arranged, and—most discreetly of all—there is not an inch of gilt framing anywhere. Heavy black frames encompass the oil paintings, and the lighter ones for the etchings are of similarly chastened hue.

The discretion of these black frames is evident to anyone acquainted with Mr. Brangwyn's painting. His deep and rather sombre colouring, the quality of richness that he achieves, could scarcely fail to be impaired if he framed his canvases in modern gilt. As a colourist, the artist is interesting, though not greatly daring. While his schemes are rich enough, they are comparatively limited in range. He views nature, as it were, through slightly darkened spectacles. When one has gazed sufficiently long at the sun or any other intensely luminous spot, one sees the opposite landscape and the sky, to which one afterwards directs one's eyes, in a warm twilight, even if it be noon-day. Mr. Brangwyn's paintings suggest that he has first looked at the sun. He does not attempt to rival the gamut of nature's tones, from highest to lowest, but contents himself wisely with expressing nature's tone as completely as the limitations of his palette allow. This, of course, was the aim of the early impressionists. But in seeking for tonality they lost colour altogether, and in their quest of perfect harmony missed the value of perfect contrast. Mr. Brangwyn does not fall into this error. He achieves his tonality without the sacrifice of contrast or colour. In a picture like the sunlit "Festa, Venice," he shows how much contrast and colour may be combined with a tonality insistent enough to satisfy the most enthusiastic exponents of the "grey" school. Mr. Brangwyn is essentially a modern in that he has taken from impressionism what he wanted, and has left the fads and fancies of the cult, the "isms" and fashions, to look after themselves. In the handling, too, of his pictures, he is a modern product of impressionism. He paints with a broad brush broadly. Superfluous detail is foreign to him; he composes in masses, and keeps the masses as simple as is consistent with the suggestion of form. His crisp touches of pigment are put on with the apparent ease that proceeds from knowledge of where and how to put them. Every touch tells in the powerful visualisations of nature that he sets forth on these canvases.

In decoration, as typified by the two large Venetian panels, his method is impressionism modified by convention. He calculates the distance at which the thing is to be seen, and paints it to produce the correct effect at that distance. The convention appears in the design, where he is content to follow the laws of balance established by the great decorators of the past. The composition in both these panels is tripartite. The first represents a Venetian festa at night with sturdy figures, gondolas, and Chinese lanterns, where the design is broken up into three divisions by upright poles. In the companion panel there is no such formal division; but the principal groups of figures are three in number, disposed symmetrically in the centre and at the wings. The handling of these pictures is Mr. Brangwyn's own, and it will afford no gratification to the spectator who investigates wall decoration through a telescope. It will appear to him that the artist has greatly transgressed not merely in regard to the omission of details, but in respect to the elimination of outline. Examined closely, these compositions do not give one the idea of having been drawn at all. They suggest a space on to which colour has been flung in handfuls and left to sort itself out, and the fact that it does so with such remarkable success would probably be attributed by the telescope critic to an unlawful necromancy. Yet the panels in their place, viewed by the spectator in his, "carry" with a quite peculiar force, and if one cannot step up to them and smell them, as one can with the Leighton frescoes at South Kensington, it is because Mr. Brangwyn is not Leighton. It does not follow, therefore, that the former is an unworthy exponent of decorative art. On the contrary, he embodies to a great extent the modern spirit in decoration, the key-note of which is independence not of laws but of examples. We can liken Mr. Brangwyn's rugged individuality to nothing contemporary or otherwise. But his art is tempered beyond a doubt, even ordered, by the principles that an aggregation of examples have ordained.

The robustness underlying Mr. Brangwyn's work is that of colour well controlled rather than of form. His human types are big and powerful, but they are not powerful as the men and women of Michael Angelo are powerful; they are not alive with the terrific sense of movement that makes the epic of the Sistine Chapel pulsate; their movements are comparatively lethargic. In this respect they observe more closely the canon of decoration that demands repose, without, however, being wholly reposeful in the manner of decoration that aims only at a pleasingly quiescent pattern and a graceful flow of line. Mr. Brangwyn does not conceive his forms either in the dramatic vein of Michael Angelo or the lyric vein of Puvis de Chavannes. That their colour is robust is due to temperament; to a temperament which asserts itself throughout the whole field of his activity, and in the domain of etching literally overflows. We have left ourselves but little space to deal with the etchings in this exhibition, but those acquainted with the Royal Society of Painter Etchers will know their character. To us the etchings have always suggested that the artist, instead of using the burin, should have used a household poker, for the lines on the zinc he employs are deep bitten with a fury as if of impatience of the ordinary instrument. He achieves some marvellous effects, however; in the blacks of "Santa Maria from the Street" there is almost the richness of mezzotint, the "Meat Market, Bruges," gleams with colour in its vivid light and shade, and the many scenes of human toilers are worthy of Meunier in their intense force and dignity. Elsewhere, as in the "Assisi," robustness approaches rather too nigh to brutality; one feels this a little perhaps, of all these tremendous plates, tremendously etched. But they are a consistent and significant part-outcome of Mr. Brangwyn's temperament.

Communications.

THE NEED FOR A NEW CORRUPT PRACTICES BILL.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I have fought five elections, and have sat ten years (1885-1895) in Parliament. Long before I entered Parliament, after the passing of the Franchise Act of 1867, a Committee was formed for the purpose of preventing the improper use of money in politics. Mr. John Stuart Mill was its Chairman, and it was my privilege to be its Honorary Secretary. I can well remember the speech—I think it was the first political speech he made—at its first meeting, when he warned us that the most serious danger against which democratic institutions would have to contend was the lavish and unscrupulous spending of money, not only at elections, but before and after elections.

Experience has quite confirmed his prescience. The Corrupt Practices Act of 1883 has been a failure because it dealt with a part only of the evil—the mere expenses of the election itself, and dealt with that part ineffectively. It left untouched the far graver evil. It did nothing to protect constituencies from, to use the emphatic words of the Prime Minister, being “demoralised, degraded, and debauched” by the contributions and subscriptions of candidates. And so we have this grotesquely absurd state of things. A candidate is disqualified with the subtle assistance of the judicial mind because a few of his voting cards had been stuck above laths, whilst his opponent, who for months before the election had been lavishly spending money in giving treats, in standing drinks at social evenings, in distributing thousands of soup tickets, is held to have done nothing illegal.

This unworthy and unscrupulous use of money is the grave peril with which we are menaced. It is the dry rot which has sapped the foundations of great empires in the past—which threatens the very existence of democracies in the future. To quote the words of an Anglican Bishop at the last Church Congress: “We see the tide of a great movement which, whether we like it or not, is going to be the master current of the life of the people of England in the twentieth century.” This current will never go too fast in this country. If it is wisely and judiciously directed we shall solve the many great social and economical problems which must sooner or later be faced and solved in a far more satisfactory manner than they can be dealt with either on the European Continent or in the States, where there is indeed imminent danger of revolutionary and ill-considered action.

The leaders of the great party which is trying to direct this current will, I hope, always treat with broad and tolerant sympathy those who make even crude proposals of social reform. Recent discussions show clearly that nothing visionary or impracticable will survive the scrutiny of such an Assembly as the House of Commons. What we have to fear is that the current will be arrested by the organised and unscrupulous use of money and a subsidised press working upon the prejudices and fears of those who cannot, or will not, think for themselves. Of this danger the recent orgy of electioneering at Peckham, where money has been profusely spent by outside organisation, is an ominously sinister indication.

The House of Commons, with all its defects—which, after all, are merely administrative and can easily be amended—is the greatest institution of its kind the world has ever seen. By it and through it we have become what we are, a people far beyond all experience of mankind and masters of our fate. It is of supreme importance that the influence of money shall not be allowed to lower its tone or character by lowering the tone and character of those who elect its members. The person of all others to whom a constituency should be under no pecuniary obligation is the man who seeks to represent it, or does represent it, in Parliament. We are demanding—very properly—not only that his election expenses shall be paid, but that he shall be paid for his services. Yet if he happens to be well off, he is not only expected to contribute largely to the expenses of local organisation and registration, but he is approached from all quarters for local subscriptions. Surely the time has come when such a demoralising state of things should be made impossible.

This, at all events, is a reform which every section of the Progressive Party in the House of Commons would welcome; though I am afraid some for obvious reasons would prefer not to take an active part in promoting it. But it is of vital importance to those who represent the working classes in that House, to whatever wing they belong, that this sinister influence should cease to handicap them both in the House and in the constituencies. They need have no hesitation about promoting an effective Corrupt Practices Bill; and I am glad to think that in my native Wales, and in many other constituencies, such a Bill would be cordially supported. When I was asked to stand in 1885 for South Glamorgan, I told them I could only do so on the understanding that I could not sacrifice my own self-respect by “ingratiating” subscriptions, and during the ten years of my service they loyally and generously respected my wish. It is true that my four contests and preparing for them cost me a good deal of money, but far less than my first contest for Birkenhead; for the admirable organisation of my large constituency by my agent, Alderman Hughes, and the earnest and intelligent voluntary work of my supporters, reduced the expenses to a minimum. Other Welsh constituencies have proved by admirable self-denial that large contributions by wealthy men to party funds are as unnecessary as they are undesirable. In these counties the Liberal electors, most of them small farmers, tradesmen, and labourers, have set an example honourable alike to themselves and their member. They have elected men not because they can send big cheques to local party funds or churches, or even to the small Nonconformist chapel, but because they have shown conspicuous ability; because they feel they understand not only the needs of Wales, but the great problems which affect the great body of the people. Those constituencies which have sent to Parliament Labour members, to whatever section they belong, will be making a fatal mistake if they do not at once combine with such constituencies as these to obtain, before the present Parliament dissolves, an Act which will deal in a thoroughly effective way with this—one of the most serious dangers they have to confront. I know that it is an evil which seems so elusive that it will require great skill and courage to grapple with it. But it can be done, and should be taken in hand at once.—Yours, &c.,

ARTHUR J. WILLIAMS.

March 26th, 1908.

Letters to the Editor.

LICENSING AND INSURANCE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Whilst the precise value attaching to the recent meeting of “Brewery Debenture Holders” will have been rightly appraised by the average citizen as a somewhat hasty and partisan attempt to strike a singularly weak blow at the Government, it is doubtful whether the full implications of the speeches then delivered (and of Lord Rothschild’s alarmist utterance in particular) have been realised, or are such as can prove satisfactory, when regarded apart from the heat of party polemics.

For, dismissing (as quite what we might expect) the academic expressions of abhorrence of drunkenness, and the ready flow of purely negative criticism, what is the legitimate inference to be drawn from the Chairman’s statements, unchallenged by his auditors? Briefly it would appear to be this: that a number of gentlemen of high and deserved standing in the realm of finance have been in haste to admit that, as regards their own affairs, they have been careless in their investments and, as concerns their actions in a fiduciary capacity, they have been woefully lacking in discretion and foresight.

If it be the case, as Lord Rothschild declares (vide “Times” report), that there is “hardly an insurance company which was not the holder of brewery debenture stocks, and perhaps of some preference shares also,” whilst the “principal security of the debenture holders is the licence values” (to quote the signed statement of the secretary of one of the largest brewing companies), we are confronted with an exceedingly serious situation, one which will not conduce to the peace of mind of policy holders. When one considers the principle, or want of principle, upon which for a very long time past many companies engaged in the brewing industry have regulated their peculiar financial engagements, the declaration of his Lordship is realised as undoubtedly ingenious in its attempt to claim insurance interestees as opponents of the Bill, but equally it is recognised as being very ingenuous, and it may yet be that the blow aimed obliquely at the Government will recoil directly in the quarter where it was least expected.

The merits or demerits of the Licensing Bill are quite apart from the question thus raised. "Expectancy" as a debenture security may smack of novelty, but it will not allay the serious doubts of the ordinary folk who have hitherto (mistakenly, as it would now appear) associated something more tangible with their notions of the premier security.

Truly we are getting on in our discussions under this "campaign of unreason"! Must we assume that the tied-house gambling system has spread its ramifications so far afield as to find buttresses in the insurance world?

Some responsible declaration on the subject appears to be imperatively called for.—Yours, &c.,

ERNEST W. LEIGHTON.

Woodford Green, Essex,
March 24th, 1908.

RELIGIOUS INSTRUCTION AND THE RIGHTS OF PARENTS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The report of the Education Committee of the London County Council, published recently in the "Times," deserves the careful attention of all who would understand what exactly is meant by the indefeasible right of the parent to have his child brought up in his own religious opinions. Neither the present Education Committee nor the Governors of St. Dunstan's College will be suspected of too Liberal proclivities. In the abstract at least they probably both denounce Mr. McKenna and all his works, and especially his attempt to impose the indefinite horrors of unsectarian religious teaching on parents who long for something definite. Here we see them face to face with a concrete instance of the difficulty, and we venture to commend their remarks to all who look on education as something more than a party cry, and would find the solution of our troubles in the practical wisdom of schoolmasters and administrators, rather than in the plausibilities of Bishops and politicians.

St. Dunstan's College (Lewisham) is conducted under a scheme which requires that religious instruction shall be given in accordance with the doctrines of the Church of England. St. Dunstan's College is also naturally anxious to share in the higher grants which Mr. McKenna has provided for schools in which (among other conditions) sectarian teaching is provided for those scholars only whose parents desire it, and not out of public funds. Under article 43 of the Regulations for Secondary Schools the Board of Education has power in certain cases, and upon the application of the local education authority, to waive these conditions. Accordingly, in July last the London County Council asked the Board to waive these conditions for the current year in respect of all the Secondary Schools aided by the Council. In the case of St. Dunstan's College the Board has not seen its way to comply with the Council's request, and the Governors have been asked to submit to the Board of Education their proposals for providing denominational instruction for those pupils whose parents desire it. A model form is submitted to the Governors as a suggestion only, and an assurance is required that the cost of any instruction to be given in the doctrines, catechism, or formularies distinctive of any particular religious denomination shall be met out of funds other than grants made by the Board or by the Council.

The Governors do not, in fact, teach any catechism or formulary. They "would greatly deprecate anything which might possibly create any religious difficulty, which has hitherto been non-existent at the college, nor do they contemplate making any change with reference to the religious instruction which has obtained in the school since its foundation in 1888, and which has proved to be satisfactory to the requirements of the neighbourhood." In fact, no doubt, the usual solution has been adopted. Simple unsectarian Christianity has been taught. The instruction has been practical, not doctrinal. The scheme requires that the religious instruction shall be in accordance with the doctrines of the Church of England. The Governors contend that "the religious teaching already given, so far as it goes, is in accordance with those doctrines."

The difficulty lies "in the determination of the extent to which doctrines, catechism, and formularies are required by the Board to be taught, as a minimum fulfilment of the requirements of the schemes." If parents are to be invited to demand that, in addition to the present teaching, instruction shall be given in doctrines, catechism, and formularies, "then, if once the discretionary power of the Governors in interpreting the requirements of the scheme is interfered with, it is difficult to say who is to determine the minimum extent to which doctrines, catechism, and formularies shall be taught. Apparently it is the parents, and the parents only, who are to demand the instruction which they think sufficient, and one parent may be content with the creeds, another may require the Catechism, a third the text of the Articles, while a fourth may demand that the Articles shall be studied critically and historically."

Now the model form submitted by the Board of Education does undoubtedly suggest that the parents shall be asked whether they desire such specific instruction, and that the school is bound, under its scheme, to provide it for those scholars whose parents duly notify their desire. But, as the Committee justly urges, "the transfer of the discretionary power of interpreting the extent to which religious instruction shall be given from the Governors to the parents would probably create an impossible position; and the only way in which a workable system can be created under the model regulations would appear to be the publication by the Board of Education of a syllabus of religious instruction for each denomination which, in the opinion of the Board, met the requirements of a scheme demanding that religious instruction shall be given in accordance with the doctrines of that particular denomination."

No argument is needed to point the absurdity of such proposals. We would rather return to the simple question at issue, the more so that we believe that St. Dunstan's College is quite typical of the majority of our older foundations.

The school is nominally an Anglican school. In fact, it is probably used impartially by all sects. Parents ask whether the teaching is good and the moral tone sound. They seldom worry about the precise religious views of the teachers. Not infrequently they even allow their children to bow down in the House of Rimmon rather than separate them from their fellows. Every parent who sends his son to Winchester or Rugby has a statutory right to withdraw him from the religious instruction. How many parents use it? Here, at any rate, at St. Dunstan's College, we are assured that religious difficulties are unknown. Meanwhile, public monies have been voted from time to time and applied to the schools, and last year Mr. McKenna made it a condition of receiving the new increased grants that the ordinary teaching should be unsectarian, and the teachers free from religious tests. What legitimate place is there for sectarian teaching or sectarian tests in such a school, supported by public money and used by parents of all creeds and none? —Yours, &c.,

G. L. BRUCE.

LIBERAL ORGANISATION.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—As an active member of the rank and file of the Liberal Party, I should like to suggest that the time is over-ripe for our responsible leaders and organisers to take stock of the general organisation of the party throughout the country.

There is a lack of coherence and co-operation that should give pause to all those really interested in the welfare of the party. The majority of our Federations are not in sufficiently close touch with our local associations. This ought to be possible, and we might with advantage take a leaf out of the book of the National Free Church Council in this respect.

It is sheer foolishness for our organisers to trust entirely to local men in organising a great party. It might be an advantage to have some tactful organisers who could spend a week or two in various districts assisting the local people to put their houses in order.

I expect I shall be told that any such interference as is here outlined would be resented by our salaried agents, but that would depend on the way in which it was carried out, and would only be a temporary difficulty if it did actually arise. Personally, I believe such outside assistance would be welcomed.

Mid-Devon would justify such an appeal as mine. How much organising work had been done there between the General Election and the by-election? What steps had headquarters taken to find out the condition of the local organisation during that time—Yours, &c.,

JOHN GRIFFITHS.

Chester, March 5th, 1908.

WOMEN AND THE PECKHAM ELECTION.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—You will doubtless be inundated with more or less omniscient explanations of the cause of the recent overwhelming defeat of the Liberal candidate in Peckham. May I, as a quite impartial observer, who am neither a Conservative nor a Liberal, a drunkard nor a teetotaler, suggest that the débâcle resulting in a turnover of almost 5,000 votes against the Liberal candidate was not entirely due to beer. Mr. Gooch, the founder or president, or whatever he is, of a Band of Hope, has not climbed into Parliament entirely on the shoulders of the toppers of Peckham. A very important factor in this election, as in that in Mid-Devon, was the influence exerted by the Women's Social and Political Union. There is not a man in the National Liberal Club to-day who does not know that Mid-Devon was lost to the Liberals because of the adverse action of the militant Suffragists—a fact which was patent even to the rowdy mob which rolled Mrs. Pankhurst in the mud when the result of that poll was declared. There is not a Liberal member to-day who does not dread the prospect of a General Election with the absolute certainty that he will have to fight not only the usual enemy, but also a very determined body which at the present time has no political creed other than that expressed in the three words, Votes for Women. I am wrong; there is one man who does not seem to realise all this, to whom Mid-Devon was not a warning, to whom, no doubt, Peckham will convey no sign of further trouble—the Premier-elect, Mr. Asquith.

Is it not time that Mr. Asquith gave up minimising the importance of the Suffragists? I confess this Peckham election has been a revelation to me of the perfectly wonderful forces which the Women's Social and Political Union are bringing to bear on by-elections. In the first place, the oratory of the Suffragists is distinctly superior to that which was to be heard either on the platforms of the Liberals or the Conservatives. You, Sir, cannot realise the influence which a speaker like Miss Christabel Pankhurst, fluent of speech, quick-witted, good-humoured, can exert on that great army ever present in each constituency which is always on the wobble.

I found that most of the meetings held by the Suffragists were well attended. They usually began by a number of small boys and disorderly hobbledoys making the usual pathetically un-funny remarks; but there was always a substantial leaven of serious people anxious to hear, willing to listen, to what the Suffragists had to say; and the rowdy element, receiving no encouragement, expired from sheer inanition. What impression Miss Pankhurst's oratory made on the ballot-box cannot, of course, be estimated in cold votes, but I am perfectly certain that that impression was not slight. When a crowd begins by slight jeering or listening coldly, and ends by cheering enthusiastically, the influence exerted between the two periods of time denoted by the beginning and ending of a political oration cannot be small.

As a purely impartial observer of the Peckham election, I submit to you, Sir, and to the Liberal Party, that it is time they started doing something for the women. The mandate may not have been there in 1906, but it most certainly is there now.—Yours, &c.,

ST. JOHN G. ERVINE.

13, Champion Park, Denmark Hill, S.E.,
March 25th, 1908.

WOMEN AND LIBERALISM.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Your "Woman Liberal" correspondent of last week makes a strong bid for the continuance of the party loyalty of Liberal women, but she overlooks a point that is having some weight with the women of Lancashire and Cheshire with whom I am in touch. It is no longer a question of being "a Liberal before I am a woman," but of putting party before principle.

Has it, or has it not, been one of the most cherished maxims of our constitution that taxation without representation is tyranny? Has it, or has it not, been the battle-cry of reform that the Government should be "of the people, by the people, for the people"? Even the lawyers have not yet taken from women the right to be called "people," and it is left to a Liberal Government to turn a deaf ear to a cry for reform that is stronger and more persistent than has been any other (if we may judge by the volume and number of petitions presented to Parliament) in the last two centuries. This, the one constitutional method of asking for the redress of a grievance, Governments of both parties entirely ignore. Of the Conservatives, Liberal women naturally expect little, but that their own Government should still turn a deaf ear to the cry is straining party loyalty to the breaking point. Liberal women know enough to realise that, unless they get a pledge from the Government to make Women's Suffrage a plank in their platform and bring it before the electors, they will be met by the same "non possumus" even in a new Parliament. It is this pledge which is withheld. Every reform is beset with difficulties, this perhaps with fewer than most, for it seeks to change no existing franchise, but merely to make it fully operative. It is not at all a question of all women, or even of a majority of women, wanting the vote; it is whether a large minority of the nation are not suffering a great injustice which is an injury not to the women alone, but to the nation as a whole. Many Liberal women believe this, and, cost them what it may, will give up their party for the sake of principle.—Yours, &c.,

MARGARET ASHTON.

President of the Lancashire and Cheshire Union of Women's Liberal Associations.

Fairfax House, Didsbury, Manchester,
March 5th, 1908.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Would you permit me to point out, in reference to your article on Woman Suffrage, that there is one very strong reason for giving this reform "the preference which its advocates demand over the reform of the male electoral basis" since, at present, nearly eight millions of men are enfranchised but not one woman has the vote? It is true that certain electoral anomalies prevent some men from having votes when a General Election comes round. But every one of these men is a political voter; he knows, too, that no law will be passed in which man's point of view is not represented. The difference is so vast between a voteless woman and a voteless man under these circumstances that it is surprising to find comparison being seriously made between them. "The two kinds of injustice" emphatically do not "stand upon the same footing," and in no sense can the redress of the woman's grievance be called a matter of convenience. Woman's political disability is not an "inconvenience"; it is, besides being an injustice whose existence is a reproach to a progressive Government, a serious handicap in the battle of life, and one which affects the well-being of the whole race. And this handicap is placed upon what is called, by those who usually oppose Woman Suffrage, the weaker sex. We look, Sir, to you, who always show yourself so courageously on the side of progressive justice, to advocate rather than to seek to postpone, the immediate consideration of a reform which will bring so many more in its train.—Yours, &c.,

HELEN VIOLET NAYLOR.

41, Endymion Road, Finsbury Park,
London, N.,
March 9th, 1908.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Your correspondent, "Another Woman Liberal," puts into plain words the prevailing misconception in most of the Women's Liberal Associations to-day, viz., that supporting a party is equivalent to supporting a principle. It is not to be feared that the members of these associations will be "coerced" into giving up this misconception; but, as its removal is as desirable as that of the fiscal conceptions "Another Woman Liberal" laments, continual endeavour has to be made to remove it. It is not surprising that the women who feel that the political enfranchisement of their sex is the most urgently needed reform should dissociate themselves from organised bodies whose inertia is one of the great hindrances to its achievement.

Since the very root-principle of British constitutional liberty is involved in the recognition of the claim of women for political existence, the opportunist theories and counsels put forth carry no weight. Why delay on the grounds that the basis of the franchise is not ideally perfect? The measure of enfranchisement demanded, "on the same terms as it is, or may be, granted to men," need not be less satisfactory to the one sex "as Liberals or as women" than it is to the other as Liberals or as men. If both should be dissatisfied, then let both together press for further reform.

Then also there appears to be a marked strain of opportunism in "Another Woman Liberal's" suggestion that women of property would support Conservative policy. She appears to ignore the many women earners who would be enfranchised. The professions and industries are full of such; all paid at a lower rate than men for equivalent services, and whose earnings are taxed at the same rate. It can hardly be urged that the "total expectation" of the political sympathies of enfranchised women is in the reactionary direction.

But even if it were so, it would not be in accord with Liberal principles to withhold from British women subjects their right of citizenship, though, alas! it is seen to be easily in accord with the aims of the Liberal Party. The argument that hardly one woman of property could be found amongst the pro-Boers is not a very weighty one. Women of property form a very small class, so that it is not surprising that they should have fewest supporters of an unpopular cause.

In conclusion: Did Kate Hessel in her letter of the previous week make such a mistake as "Another Woman Liberal" notes? I nowhere read that she claimed that every woman voter would be an intelligent and capable supporter of political and social reform, any more than every man voter. But she justly claimed that the possession of the vote by women would release and bring into effective action a great force of hearty and intelligent work for the public good. So much might be granted, if only the members of Women's Liberal Associations were to be enfranchised.—Yours, &c.,

SUSAN CUNNINGTON.

March 21st, 1908.

"THE RICH MAN'S DILEMMA."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The matter raised in my previous letter and your contributor's note stands for more than this title indicates, and I trust you can give space for further elucidation of the questions which stand at the front of the poverty problem. I do not demur to your contributor's statements. My only complaint is that he does not sufficiently analyse them. "Over-production, attended by a general fall of prices, including the price of labour power," would not answer my suggestion of an automatic remedy at all. The "over-production" I suggested would not be attended by a fall of the price of labour power; and though it would tend to a fall in prices of commodities, there could be no certainty on that point, just as there can be no certainty of a rise of prices from Protection. The increased demand in the case of the "over-production" I advocate would probably keep up the prices, as the falling-off in demand in the case of Protection has the effect of defeating the purpose of those who seek to raise prices by it. But the consequences to the community differ as bright sunlight differs from pitch darkness. The one case means superabundance, with general prosperity, the other scarcity and yet no demand. The "general fall in prices" which we experience results from stopping production.

This may sound paradoxical, but is simple when the circular motion of trade is realised. For demand does not fall off from lack of capacity or desire to consume, but from want of power to get. The labourer does not reduce his price of labour because his subsistence is easier to attain. On that we seem agreed. The old doctrine that his wages depend on the cost of maintaining him is surely by this time exploded. The rate of wages falls because the demand for labour falls off, which is a very different thing. But the demand for labour does not fall off until either its price has been raised beyond the point at which it affords a profit to its purchaser, or the demand for the product has fallen off. No power on earth can maintain a general demand for labour which affords no profit. The pump handle of taxation can do it for a few to the loss of the remainder, and so increase the evil; but that absolutely cannot be done for all. Use of a commodity, it ought to be said, is profit to the ultimate consumers. And the demand for the product (as for labour) falls off by reason of high prices. If, therefore, several hindrances stand in the way, making it necessary to impose high prices to the consumer; such as taxation on the use or occupation of land, taxation on improvements aiding production, taxation on importation of the commodities obtained in exchange from other nations; the demand must be diminished. Hinc illæ lacrymæ. The whole question at issue is whether, on the one hand, an attempt should be made to stop the supply or increase the demand, or whether, on the other hand, production of supply should be so far freed that natural forces result in increased demand. The Protectionist says "Stop the supply." His error is crude. The orthodox of our time says "Increase the demand." Your contributor, without using the words, is obviously orthodox in this sense. The notion appears to be to take the power of demanding from those who have it, and give to those who are without. I am a heretic. I point to hindrances which make supply more difficult and costly. Because of them, prices are high compared with ability to purchase, and demand flags, naturally producing want of employment, which further diminishes demand. Here is the "period of depressed trade," naked and palpable. Taxes imposed on use of land and on the exertion of industry in profitable occupations to find employment for men at a loss or a remotely prospective profit cannot solve the difficult. Taxes on those who produce ought, on the contrary, to be diminished, and those who hold idle without using must no longer be exempt from taxes.

Thus will production be encouraged, and also more demand for commodities by the double cause of more wages for labour and lower prices of commodities. More money put into productive enterprise would tend in the same direction, which is my answer to your contributor's original point. But "the rich man's dilemma" would no longer exist, since the poor man would be producing comforts for all, instead of begging leave to produce luxuries for the rich. And if there is any other original source of production held idle besides land, let that also be taxed. I do not know of such a source, unless it is a question of words, and I ought to have spoken of the earth so as to include the sea as well as the land. Human effort is an essential means (but not a source) of production, while tools and stock are only an aid to human effort.

The source of production is now, ever was, and ever will be, the earth; and those who have monopoly of it should pay taxes according to the value of their monopoly, and not according to their use of it, or their produce from it. In this way the rich man will be saved from his dilemma, and, so far, the poor man from his poverty.—Yours, &c.,

F. U. LAYCOCK.

Sheffield, March 21st, 1908.

THE PERILS OF LAND PURCHASE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—At a time when the landless rural population of England is indulging the hope that dreams of freedom and competence are about to be realised through the operation of the Small Holdings Act, it is particularly necessary that those responsible for the raising of that hope should recognise certain dangers which enthusiasm may create and omit to avert.

The term "land hunger" is glibly used, but its stimulation and improper satisfaction has been a potent cause of human misery and national disaster. It has been the experience of the writer to see land settlement schemes brought into operation which have failed to realise the hopes of their advocates, and as in each instance the underlying cause of total or partial failure has been the same, a reference to it and to the likelihood of its operating to the detriment of the present movement in England may not be wholly out of place. The land settlement policy of Lord Milner resulted in a complete fiasco, and an acute observer who correctly diagnosed the cause said: "Lord Milner went about buying land with a brass band." That is to say, Lord Milner, impressed with the importance of his scheme and confident of its success, went into the market with borrowed millions and a flourish of trumpets to procure land. The natural result was that he created a "land boom," and the price went up by leaps and bounds. The would-be settlers who came to the Transvaal after the war with capital and experience, and more particularly the Australians and New Zealanders who had knowledge of "land booms," seeing at a glance how matters stood, left the country. Others less well equipped as regards experience procured land, and before long bewailed their fate and Lord Milner's ineptitude. The débris of these land settlements is now scattered throughout the Transvaal to mark the ghastly failure of this particular effort to settle men upon the soil by way of land purchase.

These delusive hopes would never have been raised and this fiasco would not have come about had the lesson of Australasian experimental legislation been applied. There was a time when Australian politicians thought to solve the problem of land settlement by way of schemes based upon purchase. But here again the same cause has operated to wreck enterprises belauded at their inception by enthusiastic promoters. Ahead of State endeavour has risen the price of land, ever tending to make men thus settled slaves of the soil they hungered to acquire. So well defined has been this result that land purchase has come to be a recognised Conservative policy, harmonising with the interests of the great landowners.

These results from colonial land settlement experiments naturally suggest the thought that there are grave dangers in the stimulus being given by the Small Holdings Act to land acquisition in England. Here again we find that land is to be purchased or hired to a brass band accompaniment, and everything is being done to stimulate a land boom. Already the price of land is going up, and where that rising tendency will stop no one can say. It may, however, be predicted with confidence that if nothing be done to check this tendency the result will be disastrous not only to the small holders but also to all present land users. For the former will have to pay a rental which will unduly cut into the narrow margin of possible profit, and the latter will have present rents increased. Mr. Winfrey, M.P., has stated he estimates that the price of land will advance twenty-five per cent. as a result of the Small Holdings Act, but the probability is that this estimate will be exceeded. The price of Irish land has advanced over sixty per cent. since the last Land Purchase Act came into operation, and one investigator is already setting down a fifty per cent. increase on present rent as the rent to be paid by small holders.

Consequently it cannot be denied that the Small Holdings Act by creating a land boom may bring about a condition of affairs opposed to the interests of all land users, present and prospective. The question therefore arises whether the State can do anything to avert this calamity, for such it would undoubtedly be. Here the experience of the Australasian colonies is extremely valuable. As has been shown, land settlement schemes based upon purchase are no longer regarded as providing a solution of the land problem.

Another policy now holds the field, championed by the democracy of every colony, and initiated with success in almost all. This is the taxation of land values. This method of dealing with the problem of land monopoly has exactly opposite results to those following upon land purchase. Instead of land being run up to a fictitious price or rental through State action, the effect of the land values tax is to check speculation in land and force it into use on terms relative to its present producing capacity.

Consequently it may be urged that a land values tax is the necessary complement of the Small Holdings Act, and that it should be imposed to avert the dangers that have been alluded to. Were this done the present position would be entirely reversed. Instead of a land boom created by an active demand on the one hand for land and a close monopoly control on the other, there would be an active desire on the part of land owners to procure land users.

For it would then no longer be profitable to hold land out of use or full use in the confident expectation that future years would bring fresh increments of value. The prospect would be changed to one of fresh increments of taxation. Australasian experience has placed this result of the taxation of land values beyond the region of theory, and it holds the field as the only method of dealing with the evils of land monopoly.

And whilst the land values tax would have this beneficial result from economic forces it would set in operation, it would provide a revenue from an untapped source which would enable the Government to embark on supplementary social reforms.

In conclusion, it may be urged that this question is one of paramount importance to the whole community. Should the result of the Small Holdings Act be the placing of large numbers of men upon land acquired at a fictitious price or hire from present holders, and an increase of rent to small farmers, it will inevitably follow that those burdened with an inflated rent as a result of State action will ultimately call upon the State to provide a fictitious price for the produce of that land. An insolvent peasantry may be relied upon to be bigoted opponents of free food importation, and consequently the cause of Free Trade is involved in this matter.

Land settlement by way of purchase is as a new toy to the English public, but to a land reformer who has seen the system in operation it is like a double-edged knife without a haft—a dangerous thing to handle. But a haft can be provided to make the weapon safe and serviceable, and it can be found in a land values tax.—Yours, &c.,

R. L. OUTHWAITE.

Poetry.

THE KEEPER.

God placed a Life in my hand
As I passed Him by on the Waste,
And He said, "Dost thou understand?"
And I answered "Yea," in my haste.

And the Life held life and waxed strong,
And its beauty was fair to see:
And it knew not of right nor of wrong,
And went in my ways with me.

But one day it left my care,
And stumbled on, slow, behind;
And at last, from I knew not where,
I heard its cry in the wind.

I passed God by on the Waste—
I had no Life in my hand—
And God stayed me long from my haste,
And taught me to understand.

ALEX. J. GRANT.

The World of Books.

THURSDAY NIGHT.

WE understand that Mr. Balfour has just completed a volume on philosophy which will probably be published during the autumn. It will be interesting to see in what direction the mind of the author of "A Defence of Philosophic Doubt" and "The Foundations of Belief" has moved since the publication of those volumes.

* * *

MR. JOHN LANE has made arrangements with M. Anatole France and his publishers to issue an English translation of all M. Anatole France's works, including "La Vie de Jeanne d'Arc," the second volume of which has been issued this week. The series will be edited by Mr. Frederic Chapman, and amongst the translators are Mr. A. R. Allinson, Mrs. Rosa Newmarch, Miss Winifred Stephens, Mrs. John Lane, Miss M. P. Willcocks, and the editor. The English rights of Lafcadio Hearn's fine translation of "Le Crime de Sylvestre Bonnard" have also been secured. The first volume to be issued will be a rendering of "Le Lys Rouge."

* * *

THE same publisher has in preparation "French Novelists of To-day," by Miss Winifred Stephens. The book is intended to be a guide to English readers who wish to keep in touch with the best French fiction of the day. Miss Stephens has spent much time in France, and has made a careful study of the main currents of French thought, especially in their bearing upon the works of the modern school of novelists. The authors dealt with are Maurice Barrès, René Bazin, Paul Bourget, Pierre de Coulevain, Anatole France, Pierre Loti, Marcel Prévost, and Edouard Rod—an interesting and representative selection, though the brothers Margueritte, the brothers Rosny, and Madame Marcelle Tinayre ought to be included.

* * *

A BIOGRAPHY which should prove of great interest is that of the fifth Duke of Newcastle, which will be published shortly by Mr. John Murray. It has been written by Mr. John Martineau, to whom we already owe an excellent book on Sir Bartle Frere. Mr. Martineau has made use of the family papers and other unpublished documents, and in the coming volume he attempts to clear the Duke's memory from a great part of the blame which he incurred for the maladministration of the Crimean War. It will be remembered that it was the Duke of Newcastle, then Lord Lincoln, who, by his father's influence, first secured a seat in Parliament for Gladstone, and long remained his close friend. The Duke was one of Peel's trusted followers, holding in succession the offices of Secretary of State for the Colonies, Chief Secretary for Ireland, and Secretary of State for War. His letters may therefore be expected to throw fresh light both on the Crimean War and on Peel's attitude towards the Free Trade agitation.

* * *

To their useful "Library of Early Novelists," Messrs. Routledge are about to add a Picaresque section, under the general editorship of Mr. H. Warner Allen. The first volumes to appear are "Celestina" and "Lazarillo de Tormes," both works of capital importance in the study of Picaresque fiction. "Lazarillo" appeared in 1554, and has been assigned, though without much evidence, to the Spanish poet and statesman, Diego Hurtado de Mendoza. It enjoyed an amazing popularity in Elizabethan times, having been translated into every European language, and its influence may be traced in the work of many of our early novelists. Cervantes is known to have studied it, and Le Sage borrowed from it. "Celestina," a tragi-comedy by F. de Rojas, was translated into English by Mabbe in 1631, and has been edited by Mr. J. Fitzmaurice-Kelly in the Tudor Translation Series. Messrs. Routledge's reprint will contain a lengthy introduction on the Picaresque novel by Mr. Warner Allen.

* * *

"THE MEMOIRS OF EDWARD VAUGHAN KENEALY, LL.D.," by his daughter, Miss Arabella Kenealy, which will shortly be published by Mr. John Long, should make interesting reading. Dr. Kenealy took part in many famous trials. He defended Palmer, the poisoner, prosecuted Overend and Gurney, showing great powers of attack, and finally sunk his considerable reputation in the struggle to save "The Claimant" to the Tichborne name and estates. He afterwards sat in Parliament as member for Stoke-on-Trent—not a happy experience for him or the House. On one occasion Dr. Kenealy declared that he would shake off calumny "like dew-drops off a lion's mane." Several writers drew attention to the forcible simile, believing it to be original. It was, of course, taken from a passage in "Troilus and Cressida."

* * *

THE success of "The Virgil Pocket-Book," which was reviewed in our columns on April 27th last, has encouraged Mr. S. E. Winbolt to compile a companion volume, "The Horace Pocket-Book," which will be published in the autumn by Messrs. Constable. It is agreeable to see that even in these days of half-penny journalism and slipshod style there are still people who value the severe and careful phrasing of the great Latin classics. Horace, who lived in an age so like our own, lends himself to Mr. Winbolt's purpose even more than Virgil did, and he has supplied more quotations bearing on the life of to-day than has any other ancient writer outside the Bible. As in the former volume, an English prose translation of each Latin extract will be printed on the opposite page.

* * *

AN American writer, Mr. A. Lawrence Lowell, has aimed at producing a book on English political institutions similar in scope to Mr. Bryce's "The American Commonwealth." It is to be in two volumes, and will be published next month by Messrs. Macmillan.

* * *

THE much-needed catalogue of the Gladstone library at the National Liberal Club has been issued, a bulky volume of nearly a thousand pages. Mr. F. G. Haley, the librarian, has done his work well. The elaborate subject-catalogue is most useful, and fully justifies the immense amount of labour it entailed. Founded in recognition of Mr. Gladstone's services to the country, and opened by him in May, 1888, the library contains to-day 24,460 bound volumes, and 20,152 unbound pamphlets. From the first it has been of the greatest service for writing, as well as reading, and, we might add, for drawing also, since some of "F. C. G.'s" famous cartoons were conceived and sketched there.

* * *

BOOKS TO BE READ:—

- "The Story of the Guides." By Colonel G. J. Younghusband. (Macmillan. 7s. 6d. net.)
- "Folklore as an Historical Science." By G. L. Gomme. (Methuen. 7s. 6d. net.)
- "George Ridding, Schoolmaster and Bishop." By Lady Laura Ridding. (Arnold. 15s. net.)
- "Memoirs of Field-Marshal Sir Henry Norman." By Sir William Leo-Warner. (Smith, Elder. 14s. net.)
- "Some London Churches, Ancient and Modern." By T. Francis Bumpus. (Werner Laurie. Two vols. 6s. net each.)
- "The Search for the Western Sea: The Story of the Exploration of North-Western America." By L. J. Burpee. (Alston Rivers. 16s. net.)
- "Beau Brummell and His Times." By R. Boutet de Monvel. (Nash. 10s. net.)
- "A Star of the Salons: Julie de Lespinasse." By Camilla Jebb. (Methuen. 10s. 6d. net.)
- "The Real India." By J. D. Rees, M.P. (Methuen. 10s. 6d. net.)
- "Sport and Life on the Pacific Slope." By H. A. Vachell. (Nash. 7s. 6d. net.)
- "The King's General in the West: The Life of Sir Richard Granville, 1600—1659." By the Rev. R. Granville. (Lane. 10s. 6d. net.)
- "The Diary of a Looker-on." By C. Lewis Hind. (Nash. 7s. 6d.)
- "Christ and the Nation." By H. Hensley Henson, D.D. (Unwin. 6s.)
- "From Their Point of View." By M. Loane. (Arnold. 6s.)
- "The Thief on the Cross." By Mrs. Harold E. Gorst. (Nash. 6s.)
- "Vie de Jeanne d'Arc," Tome Deuxième. Par Anatole France. (Paris: Calmann-Lévy. 7fr. 50.)
- "Trois Eglises et Trois Primitifs." Par J. K. Huysmans. (Paris: Plon-Nourrit. 3fr. 50.)
- "Science et Religion dans la Philosophie Contemporaine." Par Emile Boutroux. (Paris: Flammarion. 3fr. 50.)

Reviews.

THE PRO-CONSUL AS HISTORIAN.*

I.

LORD CROMER has, we think, exhibited the advantages and the disadvantages attending the description and criticism of recent events by men who have taken a conspicuous part in them. "Modern Egypt" has the form and much of the material of history; in the authority of the writer and his access to first sources it compares with such a work as Clarendon's "History of the Rebellion." Yet if an unfriendly critic were to describe it as a pamphlet of nearly 1,200 pages, written to accuse or to excuse a number of personages, including the author, some of them dead, some alive, engaged together in a controversy the flames of which still smoulder or are even fiercely alive, the criticism could not be entirely rebutted. The book is more than this. It is an impressive record of res gestæ, of a great episode. But it must be remembered that the main truth about the stormy events it discusses and describes rests, like all truth, partly on the surface, partly beneath. The writer, like most men of strong character and instinctive bias of temperament, takes some parts of this truth, and lightly dismisses other parts. He relies on some confidential documents; others he chooses or is obliged to withhold. He dispenses judgments freely, sometimes caustically, on himself, on one great statesman, on many of his contemporaries, on the half-whimsical, half-heroic figure of Gordon, on military, political, and moral issues, in many of which his own reputation and judgment were deeply concerned. He compasses a sphere of public responsibility which he, an ex-agent of the Crown, has very recently quitted. It seems to us that if Lord Cromer were intentionally unfair or deeply prejudiced, this action would give him a signal advantage in the handling of disputable matter. Few of the persons here impeached, or judged, or praised, can answer or fully criticise him. The lips of the survivors are sealed, or partially sealed, for Lord Cromer's book traverses Cabinet secrets, and often half reveals them. The friends of the dead are under similar restrictions. Lord Cromer, we know, is not intentionally unfair; he often writes both with breadth of view and with singular balance of judgment, adducing pros and cons, and frankly admitting his own mistakes. But he has a power of directly pleading and indirectly advancing a cause which, under the special circumstances, gives portions of his book the aspect of a judgment prematurely issued by a tribunal having solid interests in one side of the case. His judgments on himself seem to us mild; his verdicts on others much less restrained.

This much we have to say by way of general criticism. But the merits of Lord Cromer's book are conspicuous. It would have been easy to write the story of the failure of the relief of Gordon, which is the first governing theme of his pen, in a series of malicious might-have-beens. So partisans have written it; so, it is obvious, Lord Cromer does not, and could not, write it. All things considered, his narrative relieves the Government of 1880 of a mass of undeserved odium, which unscrupulous partisanship or unthinking hero-worship cast upon it. On the whole, Lord Cromer's view coincides pretty closely with that of Gladstone and Granville. The latter he judges shrewdly and fairly. Granville was yoked unequally with Gambetta in the policy which culminated in the unhappy Joint Note of 1882. His insight divined the peril of Gambetta's tone and method; but his will shrank from decisive measures, and in the crisis of the Arabi movement, which Lord Cromer assesses quite fairly, he fell feebly into line with the French statesman's anti-Nationalism. A less palpable and far more excusable lack of judgment was his failure definitely to veto the Hicks expedition. Granville then first adumbrated the policy of the abandonment of the Soudan, a decision so warmly approved by Lord Cromer that he insists (Vol. I., p. 392) that the Gladstone Administration "deserves the eternal gratitude of the Egyptian Government for coming down with a heavy hand on all the vacillations of the Cairene administrators." But the Foreign Minister did not go the length of stopping Hicks's hopeless adventure, though failure seemed inevitable. Interference at that juncture was a very delicate business; Lord Cromer was probably right in thinking that it might have been successfully tried. But in the substance of his survey of Gladstonian policy he discloses no acute or large points of difference. He is loud in praise of the Government's loyalty and strict honour. Their principle of abandoning the Soudan at a time when the shattered State had neither the means nor the men for keeping it he cordially endorses, and with the exception of the error about Hicks he does not consider them responsible for its loss. He does not seriously dispute the Government's conclusion against sending a portion of Sir Gerald Graham's force from Suakin to Berber. More curiously still, he was at one with Gladstone, against whom, we are afraid we must say, his animus is evident, on more than one capital point.† Like Gladstone, he was originally against the recourse to Gordon, and bitterly regretted that he ever changed his mind. Like him, he favoured the employment of Zobeir Pasha—after having first deprecated it. Like him and the whole Government, he suffered from Gordon's irresponsibility and irrational impulsiveness, which he condemns in terms far more scathing than the generous Gladstone ever allowed himself to use.

It is, indeed, at this point that we approach the grave, the unaccountable, defect of the book. It concerns Lord Cromer's treatment of one incident—that of the time of sending the relief expedition to Khartoum. In all that regards Gordon Lord Cromer is to be commiserated; and, indeed, he abundantly commiserates himself. Gordon's unsteadiness of character seems to have infected nearly everybody around him; it acted as a witch's potion in the cauldron of the Egyptian confusion. Lord Cromer was for sending him and against sending him; he changed his mind on Gordon's route to Khartoum, and on the desirability of his staying there. The now obvious truth is that, as Lord Cromer sorrowfully admits, Gordon should never have been sent. Gladstone and Gladstone's two ablest colleagues—Mr. Chamberlain and Sir Charles Dilke—were, we believe, opposed to his "mission" from the first. To send him, with all his gifts and graces, was to despatch a hare-brained man on a hare-brained errand. But he was loveable and a paladin, he had bewitched the sentimental public, which overbore Gladstone's forebodings, and, for a brief period, he captured even the stubborn fancy of Lord Cromer. The disillusion was swift and complete. Gordon overwhelmed his colleague with contradictory telegrams. He threw his instructions, in Lord Cromer's words, "to the winds." Sent on a strictly peaceful mission, in which his personal initiative was to be the sole factor, he changed it into a warlike one, because, said Lord Cromer, he was a "very bellicose soldier," and could not resist a fight. In a few days, he sketched out five separate policies. He was for abandoning the Soudan; he was for evacuating, and not abandoning, it; he was for handing it over to the Turks, to the British, to "petty sultans," and, finally, these loose plans hardened in the wild decision to "smash the Mahdi." He ruined his mission by his want of reserve; he lacked nearly every quality of a Governor and an agent, save his native charm and sweetness, his serene and exalted courage.

These defects Lord Cromer describes with no want of point or elaboration. But when he sums up the moral of a story whose tragic end the chief actor ordained and encompassed, he forgets the considerations he himself has pressed home, and reduces it to a single charge of culpable delay and vacillation in the starting of the relief expedition. He leaves out of account the cumulative effect of Gordon's follies, and especially the stunning and bewildering results of his complete change of plans, a change which in justice, if not in consideration and tenderness for a gallant and attractive but untrustworthy man, absolved the Government of the obligation to send an expedition at all. Lord Cromer, however, abruptly shifting ground, makes the following distinct charge of delay, which he subsequently declares to be inexcusable:—

†The prejudice of Lord Cromer's notes on Mr. Blunt is natural, but regrettable, and a little undignified. Mr. Blunt shows in the "Academy" that Lord Cromer unjustly suggests that he betrayed Sir Edward Malet's confidence, and that this charge rests on the transference of Mr. Blunt's words from one occasion when he was in no relation to Sir Edward, to another period when he was—surely a vital difference.

* "Modern Egypt." By the Earl of Cromer. Macmillan. 2 vols. 24s net.

"The most indulgent critic would scarcely extend beyond June 27th (1834) the date at which the Government should have decided on the question of whether a relief expedition should or should not be despatched. On that day the news that Berber had been captured on May 26th by the Dervishes was finally confirmed. Yet it was not till six weeks later that the Government obtained from Parliament the funds necessary to prepare for an expedition." (Vol. I., p. 590.)

It will be observed that two assumptions underlie this statement. The first is that the reasons of delay were political not military; the second that the Government's decision to send was only taken on August 8th, when the vote of credit was asked for. Both are unwarranted. It is obvious on the face of it that the Government must have made up their minds on policy before conveying an announcement to Parliament. It is on record that they did so make up their minds. Gladstone stated it, in defending his policy in the following year, 1885:—

"We never denied that we were under obligation to Gordon. After the debate in the House of Commons on May 12th, we did not fail in one single hair's breath in the absolute fulfilment of that covenant."

In other words, he treated his declaration in that debate as an obligation to send out an expedition. Was that a late decision? On the face of things, it was not. Lord Cromer suggests that Gordon had given full warning of imminent peril on March 8th, 1884. Yet on an earlier page he quotes a message of the General dated April 1st, in which he spoke of the "truly trumpery nature of the revolt, which 500 determined men could put down."

But if the Government decided on the principle of an expedition in the late spring or early summer of 1884—well within Lord Cromer's time-limit—what explains the delay in announcing and starting it? Is it possible that Lord Cromer is ignorant of its governing cause? He cannot be, for (Vol. I., p. 580) he states that a "good deal of difference of opinion existed among the military authorities as to whether it would be desirable to move by Suakin or to adopt the Nile route. Lord Wolseley preferred the latter alternative." Mr. Morley describes the main difficulty in a striking sentence. "The generals in London," he said ("Life of Gladstone," Vol. III., p. 164), "fought the battle of the routes with unabated tenacity for month after month." This, indeed, was the main difficulty. It involved a difference between the War Office and the Admiralty, the latter of which naturally preferred the Berber-Suakin route. But Lord Cromer mis-states the essence of the trouble when he barely records the fact that Lord Wolseley preferred the river way. This was Lord Wolseley's second decision, not his first. The earlier preference was for Berber-Suakin as the shortest and probably the best means of approach to Khartoum. So far did Lord Wolseley's choice go that contracts were made for a military railway from Suakin, and a complete set of contractors' plant was shipped to that port. Then came a slow change of view. Advisers who had Lord Wolseley's confidence expounded the advantages of the river route. It was hoped to overcome the difficulties of the Nile passage by the help of Canadian boatmen. Their services, again, with suitable boats, were only secured after long delays. Here, then, is ample proof of the undoubted fact that the decision of the Cabinet was long prior to the announcement in Parliament, and that the main cause of the long interval between the two events was military, not political, involving as it did the not unnatural hesitations and differences of commanders on a momentous choice. It is astonishing that Lord Cromer should have omitted these considerations from his statement of facts, and that he should have distorted his final judgment on them into a purely political condemnation of a statesman whose personal conduct to him had been beyond reproach.

[TO BE CONCLUDED.]

AN ART OF THE PAST.*

THE salon is dead. In England, where it has never flourished, our regrets for its extinction are tempered by philosophy. As a nation distinguished for taciturnity, it is a consolation to reflect that the salon was the fine flower of the ancien régime, that the freedom of its mind (and morals) was rooted in the soil of tyranny, and that the million perished in order that the few might shine. Even conversational brilliancy may be bought too dear; the guillotine is a high price for a bon-mot. Democracy has broken up the great hereditary treasures, scattered the jewels, and melted down the gold to vulgar but serviceable coin. The salon is dead; vive la république!

The nine salons described by Mr. Hamel have been divided by him into three groups—the semi-official receptions of Madame de Sévigné and La Grande Mademoiselle, the salons with a purpose, like the Hôtel de Rambouillet, and those where the interest was purely personal—Ninon de l'Enclos, Mesdames Récamier and de Stael. The career and character of each lady is described, and mention is made of her various distinguished guests; but there is little attempt to revive the atmosphere of each individual circle—an atmosphere that can always be detected in every assembly brought together by personal design. How completely different, for instance, was the tone and temper of the Hôtel de Rambouillet to the receptions of Madame Scarron, how subtly did the attitude of Madame du Deffand's guests change when in the company of Mdlle. de l'Espinasse, what a contrast must have existed for Benjamin Constant between the tempests of Madame de Stael's Coppet and the sweet serenity of Madame Récamier's Abbaye-aux-Bois! Although the guests provide the harmonies, it is the hostess herself who strikes the key. The genius of leadership is the Frenchwoman's secret; in no other country can the feminine influence so securely hold its own. Now there are two ways of maintaining an influence—the direct and the indirect. Either, like Madame du Deffand and de Stael one can dominate, or else, like Mdlle. de l'Espinasse and Madame Récamier, one can charm. No one can doubt which method is the most permanently successful. Of all the snares ever laid for the capture of the heart or brain of man, flattery is the subtlest and the surest. Madame de Rambouillet—a lady of infinite fascination—was accused by her admirers of one defect:—

"The kindly demonstrations which she gave of her friendship flattered all those who saw her, so that each believed he had what he expected from her. . . . She was blamed for always seeking to please by her civility those who had no share in her esteem; so that those who believed they had deserved it complained she appeared to give it equally to all, and to enter into the interests of everybody."

Yet one does not gather that this failing drove many of her guests away. Few women understood better than Mdlle. de l'Espinasse the art of letting others shine. "Her guests," wrote Marmontel, "harmonised so well together that they seemed like the strings of an instrument played by a master hand." It was the gentle touch of this "master hand" that kept and held together all that Madame du Deffand, in her anger and jealousy, had tried to destroy; and the Rue de Belle-Chasse, where the banished Julie de l'Espinasse took refuge, became an intellectual centre in every way as brilliant as the famous Convent of St. Joseph where her former benefactress had reigned. In Madame Récamier the art of self-suppression was carried to the pitch of genius. "She attracts and keeps her hold," is the naïve tribute of a masculine admirer, "because she does not speak much." Up to her last day, she was surrounded and adored; her whole life was spent in an atmosphere of love and friendship; yet no one has ever remembered a word she said. Juliette Récamier was not only reserved in speech; her whole nature was veiled in a reticence that has baffled all biographers. Such a character would appear colourless if it were not for the undeniable power she exerted. Perhaps the secret may be explained in the one positive statement that has ever been made about her: "Non," wrote Ste. Beuve, "Madame Récamier n'a jamais aimé." In striking contrast to this delicate sphinx is the character of her first woman friend, the brilliant, emotional, impulsive, convulsive Madame de Stael. The "whirlwind in petticoats" was too great and many-sided a figure to fulfil the somewhat narrow ideal of perfect hostess—or even of perfect woman. A genius rather than a siren, many men disliked her; some, like Heine, were never weary of making game of her; whilst her lover, Constant, confessed that whenever she left Coppet he felt "like a schoolboy whose head-master is away." It is true that her weak points were quite as conspicuous as her strong. Her love of adoration was notorious. "In the absence of cats," wrote a disillusioned female relative, "she would hold a court of rats—she would die if she had not a crowd round her." Even the pantomime of conquest was precious. De Gustine, in a letter to Sophie Gay, describes the first meeting between Madame de Stael and the Duke of Wellington:—

* "Famous French Salons." By Frank Hamel. Methuen. 12s. 6d. net.

"'Is it true,' she asked, 'that your Lord Chancellor speaks to the King kneeling, in the Session of Parliament?' 'It is true.' 'How is it done?' 'Why, Madame, as I say, he kneels when he speaks.' 'But how?' she continued. 'Would you see?' responded the Duke, and he cast himself at the feet of our Corinne. 'I wish that all the world saw it,' exclaimed Madame de Stael."

Vanity, however, may be forgiven to a woman so magnificently gifted. About her reunions at Coppet there was a richness and vitality that has never been equalled. To Bayle her salon was a phenomenon rising even to political importance. "Had it continued," he wrote, "all the Academies of Europe would have paled before it." M. Caro called the chateau "an intellectual Coblenz on the frontier of France . . . whence came forth political doctrines, a programme of ideas, a race of statesmen, a school of thinkers, which have filled with their combats, their triumphs, or their defeats, more than half a century of our history." Even Byron was conquered by the woman "who wrote octaves and talked folios." "She has made Coppet," he wrote, "as agreeable to me as society and talent can make any place on earth."

Those who have read the letters of Madame de Sévigné (that is to say, all genteel and well instructed persons) will have no need to turn to Mr. Hamel's pages for a glimpse into her world. Madame de Maintenon is better known in her less intellectual but more famous days; though as the wife of the crippled playwright Scarron, she met many more interesting people and exercised, in a quiet way, almost as great an influence as she did in her palace-prison existence chained to the heels of the king. The salon of the Grande Mademoiselle was held quite as much by divine right as by any peculiar merit on the part of the hostess; yet in spite of want of culture, eccentricity and not a little of the ridiculous in the character of the Princess, she acquired, by sheer force of will and self-confidence, a real position as leader of the social world.

EARLY CHRISTIAN ETHICS.*

EARLY Christian Ethics in the West, from Clement to Ambrose, is certainly an important and, in England, a neglected subject. Dr. Scullard treats it with a careful scholarship and a keen appreciation of Patristic literature. His point of view, however, is not one with which many will agree, for the dogmatic attitude in historical questions has generally given place to the idea of development: yet this latter conception is treated with scant courtesy by Dr. Scullard. It is true that "development" has been misused often—as it was by Newman—for the purposes of controversy. But surely it is strange to-day to hear of the "stationary character of morality" (p. 22), of the "fixity and finality of the abstract principles of morality," or that "philosophers have discovered nothing new. The Christian Church has discovered nothing new" (p. 25). The dogmatic attitude is often allied with an error—for such it is, although so great a name as Harnack's may be used in support of it—the conception that the history of early Christianity from Clement to Ambrose is one of gradual decay, after the purity of Gospel Christianity. It is arbitrary to say that the Church of the third and fourth centuries was doing less valuable work than the itinerant preachers and their extremely vague communities were doing in the first century of our era. "Laudatores temporis acti" tend to use an ideal of their own, not the facts of history, in their description of the Golden Age in early Christianity. "It can hardly be maintained that we have a perfectly Christian ethic in any of the Fathers" (p. 18). But what is a perfectly Christian ethic? Apparently Dr. Scullard implies that it is possible to regard the writings of the New Testament as more consistent or systematic than those of the early Fathers. He does not think that within the New Testament itself we have documents of the age which extends from Clement to Ambrose (p. 4); but it would be difficult to justify the dating of "II. Peter," for example, before Clement. In fact, it appears that a perfectly Christian ethic is an elaboration of the theologians. The quotations given by Dr. Scullard himself would indicate that early Christian writers were much more concerned with "edification" than with a correct theory of ethics.

There is another point concerning which Dr. Scullard's view is distinctly questionable. With the dogmatic view of history, naturally, hard lines of division appear between schools of thought. Now these lines, however useful for the purposes of learning the rough outlines of history, by no means render fairly the complexity and delicacy of historic sequence. It seems, in the first place, impossible to separate the teaching of early Christian writers on ethics from that of Pagans and Philosophers—especially if the division be made to imply the superiority of the Fathers. Lacordaire's division of all religions into Idolatry, Islam, and Christianity may be "eminently convenient," as Dr. Scullard says (p. 38), but it is so false as to be almost grotesque. Yet upon this division is made to depend a discussion of the metaphysical basis for Ethics, which fills half the book (pp. 37-146). Aristotle, the Epicureans, the Stoics, and Plato are dismissed as metaphysicians, to make place for Clement, Lactantius, Irenaeus, and Ambrose. Of course, it is acknowledged that the age of Clement and Ambrose was not a period of great thinking, but apparently it is conceived that superiority can be proved for the Fathers as compared to the greatest of the Greeks. By what criterion this result is obtained may be seen in the commendation of Patristic Ethics as being concerned not with duty and conscience but with law and external authority. The result is clear. In "the first formal thinker" among these Fathers, Lactantius, the idea of a reward is made so prominent that it appears to be his teaching that men should be moral in hopes of what Hegel would call "a tip." Morality is a means for the obtaining of "immortality." It is plain also that the Christian moralists of the age are concerned with charms (p. 125), with an exaggerated asceticism (p. 96), with a crude millenarianism (pp. 155, 172), and that they conceive themselves to belong to a specially favoured caste (p. 152).

Probably if Christian propaganda had depended upon the Patristic system of ethics, we could hardly call conversion progress. But happily, although a man's ethical system may be despicable, his morality may be great and pure. We know that it was Christian morality that influenced men, not Christian Ethics—if ethics be understood to mean the scientific and systematic theory of conduct. Pliny was struck by the fact that Christians "bound themselves by oath to avoid theft and adultery, and never to break their word." Galen was equally impressed by their lives, not by their theories. Cyprian (ad Donatum) and Justin (Apol. II. 12) owed their conversions to observed practices.

Christianity was obviously an inspiration and not a system. In the Latin Fathers from Clement to Ambrose we may not find much inspiration, but of exact thinking we shall find less. It is necessary to allow the thinker rights in the theory of Ethics, just as much as to allow of the religious elements in morality. Religious experience does not necessarily imply a deeper philosophical insight.

PASTORAL AND ADVENTURE.*

MISS TRAVERS'S "Thyrsis and Fausta" is an interesting evidence of the perennial vitality of pastoral, once a synonym for the faded and conventional in literature. The need of withdrawing from the clamour of civilisation, "from deadening toil, from fierce and desperate joy," which was always one of the springs of Pastoral poetry, is as little likely to become extinct as the need, after a shorter or longer interval, of returning to them. But the blithe symbolism of

* "Early Christian Ethics in the West from Clement to Ambrose." By H. H. Scullard, M.A. (Lond. and Camb.), D.D. (Lond.), Professor of Church History, Christian Ethics, and History of Religions in New and Hackney Colleges, London. Williams & Norgate.

* "Thyrsis and Fausta." By Rosalind Travers. Elkin Mathews. 3s. 6d. net.
"Forty Singing Seamen." By Alfred Noyes. Blackwood. 3s. 6d. net.

shepherds, shepherds' songs, and of Pan, the shaggy god of the shepherd's craft, held life by a far flailer tenure. Once transcended by the gracious woodlands of Sicily it lost all vital touch with reality, and depended for continued existence in art upon the rarer and more fortuitous grace of fancy. Hence, when the return to nature took possession of English poetry in the later eighteenth century, the old shepherd symbolism had long been quietly incorporated with the conventions it implicitly repudiated, and was swept away indignantly, with other merely decorative forms of ancient speech, by the prophets of the new faith. Nothing is more curious, however, in the evolution of nineteenth century literature, than the gradual re-discovery of the worth and use of these disused and discredited alphabets of the past. The figures of Greek myth became again eloquent and expressive in the hands of Shelley and Keats, of Tennyson, Arnold, and Morris. But even then the Pastoral world remained irresponsive, as if stricken, as it doubtless was, with a more stubborn mortality than the rest. Caucasus and Olympus stood in radiant sunshine, but the mists still hung low over Arcady. Miss Travers is not the first nor the most illustrious of those who have sought to dispel them, but she is one of the bravest and most enterprising, and one whose work helps us best to see both the perils of the way and its frequent rewards and opportunities. Even she has not ventured to show us an Arcadia very like that we know. There is not much sylvan seclusion left in this rapid and busy play, with its picturesque succession of incidents and adventures, its multiplicity of figures—shepherds and shepherd girls, dryads and fauns and water-nymphs, villagers and magicians—its yawning caverns and engulfed rivers. The unrest of the nineteenth century has found its way, after all, into these legendary haunts of Pan. And from other regions of legend-lore, too, more strongly rooted in our latter-day poetry or in our latter-day faith, there come strains of elfin music, more stirring and confident than his, to fortify the heart of the doubting wood-god. Young Erin, in the person of Mr. W. B. Yeats, takes old Arcady by the hand, or at least the hand is put into his, and virtue passes out of him. We can hardly doubt whose rhythms were stirring when the Dryads under the lowering sky, in breathless quiet, made their chant of the coming storm:

"He is far, yet we can hear
Up the vast, sullen fields of Cloudland, clear,
The tumult and falling hoofs of his shadowy horses beat,
Threatening of dread and disaster, of fire and defeat;
Of ruinous battle, hurled
Crashing down upon the forest world!"

The play is, indeed, dedicated to Mr. Yeats. More significantly still, one of Miss Travers's village elders anticipates a famous visionary formula of the master of all who see visions—William Blake. "Some fairy touch has unsealed your ears and lifted up your gaze, so that you see through and not with your eyne." We do not mention these things by way of disparagement at all. The apparatus may be somewhat too elaborate, the action somewhat lacking in simplicity and strength; but these fairy enterprises and disasters are not to be too nicely scrutinised on this score. The characters are slightly but delicately drawn; and their varieties are imagined with much resourceful play on the motives of love and avarice: Thyrsis, who resigns the devoted passion of the river-nymph Eurhœ to follow the lure of the magician into his gold-fraught cave; Fausta, the innocent shepherd girl who follows for his sake; Clorin, his sister, the frank woodland maid who knows nothing of love, and cannot imagine that anyone should like better to handle gold than to feel the sunshine; and Eurhœ, who sacrifices herself to redeem her old lover, have all some measure not merely of dramatic but of lyric quality. As much cannot be said for the "rich shepherd" Dorastus, who puts to Clorin the advantages of marrying a well-to-do husband with a mechanical regularity which is good neither as poetry nor as realism, but only as puppet-practice. On the whole the most vital moments of this Pastoral are the brief bursts of song, often rare and fascinating in rhythm. Such are, notably, besides the Dryad's song, Hylinoe's Irish lilt, "Wild airs, sad wind, heavy and changeless sky," and the final chorus of the Dryads:

"Wake! Wake! forest and underwood."

where the rhythmic echo of Scott's stirring "Ride, ride, Ettrick and Teviotdale" fills the verse with a tumultuous joy not altogether its own, strangely expressive of the intoxication of a summer midnight in the woods.

We can speak but briefly of the rest of Miss Travers's volume. The romance of the nineteenth century and its realism have commonly grown very near together, if not from a common root; poetic vision has been nourished on impassioned apprehension of fact, and hope on pity. But few contemporary poets exhibit these apparent opposites in so intimate and vital a fusion as Miss Travers, and she tackles the artistic problems which this complexity of motive involves with fearless audacity, if not with complete success. Like Mrs. Browning, to whose kindred genius she does honour, she hears the "cry of the children," and many other miseries of humanity; but she is not content to tell us of them in pathetic song; she sets us face to face with the squalid horror of London, makes us breathe the reek of the public-house, and listen, as in the powerful dramatic scene "The Fate of Life," to the sodden and vapid talk of a roomful of human wrecks, insisting on the notes of decay and ruin with less power, but with as little remorse as the author of "Creatures that once were men."

The poem which has given its title to Mr. Alfred Noyes's last volume is sufficiently unlike anything in Miss Travers's in every other respect, but presents similar daring and sudden changes of key. The "forty singing seamen in an old black barque" captivate us at once, as they land in the twilight on the magic shore of Prester John; and they tell the tale of his amiable hospitalities in a vein of humour which has something both of the boisterous geniality of "Tam o' Shanter" and of the imaginative grotesquerie of "Childe Roland." The feast is served, quick as light, by unseen fingers; then—

"The skipper, swaying gently
After dinner, murmurs faintly,
'I looks to-wards you, Prester John, you've done us very proud!'
CHORUS: And we drank his health with honours, for he done us very proud!"

There is much psychology in the final question: "Could the grog we dreamt we swallowed make us dream of all that followed?" And for our part we must demur to its having been capable of making these honest Wapping mariners "dream" of lines like these, which the poet seems to have inadvertently allowed to wander from his flute:—

"The centuries go by, but Prester John endures for ever,
With his music in the mountains, and his magic in the sky!
While your hearts are growing colder,
While your world is growing older,
There's magic in the distance, where the sea-line meets the sky."

Mr. Noyes is indeed a true poet of the sea; he was, we believe, born and bred in a West-country harbour-town, where susceptible spirits become early attuned to the peculiar "magic" hinted at in the last line. The romance of Odyssean wandering beyond the sunset, at the beck of the "siren lure of the sea," haunts his imagination; and pieces like "The Golden Hynde" sound like preludes to his own epic venture with Drake. But the magic of distance does not often or characteristically, with him, take the form of the elusive or mysterious. In his love of precise contour, clear and definite colour, and sculpturesque modelling, he is a Parnassian, not a symbolist, of the tribe of Keats, not of Shelley. "The Swimmers' Race" is a brilliant study of sea and shore, of "naked boyish beauty" "mirrored like marble in the smooth wet sand," or breasting the green-arching billows, by turns flashing like sunbeams on a crest, and melting like foam flakes out of sight, until they blend at last with all the glory of all the sea. No attempt is made to aetherialise or spiritualise this simple subject; but its implicit values of colour and movement are elicited and rendered with a delicacy of eye and a strength and sureness of touch which make the whole singularly beautiful. The Keatsian strophe would itself suggest where Mr. Noyes has sought the secret of the mastery of sensuous beauty; and some other songs or odes invite this audacious comparison still more openly, and what is more, without exposing their author to any very real risk of the guilt or the doom of Marsyas. Keats addressed the most perfect of his odes to autumn, the season of mellow fruitfulness, and left it to others to sing the songs of spring. His latter-day disciple, facing the glory of Nature with senses less potent indeed but more buoyant and elastic, makes an ode to summer, and will not hear of autumn's songs:—

"Tell me no more of Autumn, the slow gold
Of fruitage ripening in a world's decay,
The falling leaves, the moist rich breath
Of woods that swoon and crumble unto death
Over the gorgeous mould.
Give us the flash and scent of keen-edged May,
Where wastes that bear no harvest yield their bloom,
Rude crofts of flowering nettle, bents of yellow broom."

A stanza or two further, and it is the lover of the "Greek Urn" who is echoed, though again the echo is more like an answer than a refrain.

"Oh, lover, in the hawthorn lane, Dream not you hold her, or you dream in vain!"

At rare moments the felicitous audacities of Keats have tempted him to expressions more bold than happy, as in "The wild thyme on the mountain's knees Unrolls its purple market to the bees."

And his way of following in the path of great poets and executing variations on their songs is not without its snares. The two sonnets, for instance, in which he tries to find speech for "the real Dante" are passionate and beautiful. But "the real Dante" bears a close resemblance, after all, to Mr. Alfred Noyes, and we confess a preference for the "unreal Dante" who disguised himself in the "Vita Nuova."

C. H. HERFORD.

MODERN MOUNTAINEERING.*

THE sport of mountaineering is undergoing a marked and steady alteration. Its votaries are divided into two sharply distinguished and often opposed schools. The earlier school was composed of men of wide culture and great intellectual attainments, men often of the foremost distinction in other fields, who found in mountaineering a congenial relaxation. Such men were John Tyndall and Leslie Stephen. They were great mountaineers, but their highest distinctions were not their climbing triumphs. The other and newer school consists of men who are pre-eminently rock-climbers—"rock-gymnasts," the older school call them, not without some slight suspicion of contempt. They are not men of the wide culture of the great pioneers, and their mountaineering achievements are not infrequently their highest title to fame.

The books left us by men of the elder school have undeniably strange literary charm. Tyndall's "Glaciers of the Alps" is an English classic; so is Leslie Stephen's "Playground of Europe." Both these books have been read and enjoyed by hundreds of persons who have never trodden the summit of a snow-capped peak, and never seen a glacier. The works produced by the newer school lack that literary charm. Mr. Abraham is decidedly an adherent of the later school.

His book is called the "Complete Mountaineer," and belongs to a series, the other volumes of which deal with Rugby football, cricket, motoring, golf, and photography—a somewhat anomalous collection. Why not also croquet and lawn-tennis? But perhaps these volumes are to follow. The older mountaineering would more naturally have been classed with Arctic exploration, big game shooting, and the search for the sources of the Nile. A rapid survey of the contents of Mr. Abraham's book will show how completely the perspective of the modern mountaineer has altered.

This portly, well-printed, and profusely illustrated volume consists of 472 pp., divided as follows: 126 pp. are assigned to "The History and Technicalities of the Sport," 142 to "Climbing at Home," i.e., on the rocks of Cumberland, North Wales, and the Scottish Highlands; and the remainder, 304 pp., to "Mountaineering Abroad." One of the older school, if he had written such a book, would probably have omitted Part II. altogether, and "Abroad" would have a much wider meaning for him, had he lived and written now, than it has for Mr. Abraham. For in that section we find nothing on the mountains of Norway, or the Caucasus, or the Himalayas, or the Andes, or the Rockies, or the New Zealand Alps. Mr. Abraham confines himself, in his treatment of "Mountaineering Abroad" to the Alps (although portions even of these, e.g., the Bernina range, are entirely omitted) and the Dolomites.

Having written so much on the balance, or want of balance, in the book, let us turn to its undoubtedly great merits within its comparatively circumscribed limits. Mr. Abraham is without question one of the foremost of English rock-climbers, and to be in that class is to be one of the foremost rock-climbers of the world, not only in this age, but in any of the past ages, so far as human history runs. By confining himself within such narrow limits as he has done, Mr. Abraham has the advantage of dealing with climbs, every foot of which—in British rock-climbing, at any rate—he may be said to know intimately. He has accomplished the most astonishing and daring feats on the almost precipitous gullies and rock-faces of our most difficult mountains. It is impossible not to admire the daring, the skill, the strength, the nerve that he has put into his sport. He has carried his life in his hands—or rather in the tips of his fingers and toes—a thousand times, and he revels in the wild joy of danger faced and impossibilities overcome. It is a great sport, this rock-climbing, though in the opinion of even the humblest devotees of the older mountaineering far less great and less sublime than the sport of the giants of the old—i.e., of the 'fifties and 'sixties of the last century.

We are by no means sure that Mr. Abraham himself would not admit this. While he is revelling in the steep dangers of his favourite rocks, on Scawfell, or Lliwedd, or the Coolin, he can barely spare a few lines to note the majestic flight and astonished look of a great golden eagle soaring close to the intrepid climber. These long, detailed accounts of gullies and pitches and slabs and cracks become a little wearisome even to those who have climbed a few of the easiest of them. To the general reader they would be profoundly boring. But when we turn to the section dealing with the Alps, the whole book rises to a higher level. We breathe a more aetherial atmosphere; we walk with a more god-like tread. When face to face with the eternal snows, the ceaseless motion of the glacier, the giant forces of nature near their birth-cradle, Mr. Abraham's sense of the beautiful and his apprehension of the sublime increase. On his native rocks he is a master of his craft, without a superior, almost without a rival, among his fellows, always victorious over nature. Amid the Alps he is no longer in the foremost flight, though still very high; he is one not among tens, but among hundreds, perhaps thousands. He bends with a certain awe and reverence before the supreme majesty of the conquered, but still majestic mountain peaks. Even his fine photographs undergo a change. However beautiful as specimens of the photographer's art sections of rock-face, with two or three small human figures executing impossible gymnastics on their perpendicular surfaces may be, they are not, and cannot be, beautiful as pictures. But the Weisshorn or the Matterhorn, viewed from a proper distance, cannot be, even in a photograph, anything but sublime. Two sketches by the author inserted towards the end of the book—one of the view from the top of the Meije and one of the Fünffingerspitze—are so beautiful as to make us regret that a man so gifted should spend his time taking photographs.

In conclusion, we say for rock-climbers this book is a necessity; for mountaineers, so far as the Alps and Dolomites are concerned, it is a most useful book; always a safe and accurate guide so far as it goes. To those who indulge in their sport outside these limits it has not much to offer.

There are a few bad misprints. The worst we have noticed—an obvious lapsus calami in so well-informed a climber as Mr. Abraham—is in the sentence on p. 329: "Just as the name of Edward Whymper is inseparably connected with the Zmutt ridge of the Matterhorn." "Zmutt," of course, should be "Zermatt" or "North-East"; probably Mr. Abraham actually wrote the former word and this is merely a printer's error. The grammar is not always quite above suspicion, and here and there the language is more worthy of the junior reporter turned on to do a football match than of the dignity of an imposing and valuable book. The photographs—for which Mr. Abraham and his brother are deservedly famous—are rather too sensational. Some of these pictures are more apt to make one giddy than the scenes themselves are. Of the rock-climbs perhaps this is not true; but the big mountains

* "The Complete Mountaineer." By G. D. Abraham. Methuen. 10s. 6d. net.

BROWN LANGHAM'S LIST

A GREAT LABOUR LEADER.

LIFE OF

Right Hon. THOMAS BURT, M.P.

By AARON WATSON.

15s. net.

"It is extremely interesting at this juncture of our industrial development to have the story of the life of a man like Mr. Thomas Burt. . . . It was an admirable idea of Mr. Watson's to give us this account of the life of one who is so much loved and esteemed, not only amongst Northumbrians, but amongst all who have their country's good at heart, and to show us of what stuff such men are made."—Westminster Gazette.

THE AUTOMOBILIST ABROAD

By FRANCIS MILTOUN,

Author of "Castles and Châteaux of Old Touraine," "Cathedrals of Northern France," &c.

With Illustrations and Decorations by BLANCHE MCMANUS. A number being in full colour, 8vo boxed. 10s. 6d. net.

Mr. Miltoun's new book of travel "en automobile" is the record of hundreds of miles of motoring through regions rich in beautiful views, in strange costumes, and quaint peoples, whose pictured and narrated charms form a volume of exceptional attractiveness.

The trip is across seven frontiers, through the British Isles, France, Belgium, Holland, and Germany, and contains much of historical sentiment and romance that could only have been gleaned by leisurely travellers.

HINDUSTAN UNDER FREE LANCES.

By H. G. KEENE, C.I.E.,

Author of "History of India," &c. 8vo. Illustrated. 15s. net.

Mr. Keene's new book deals with the soldiers of fortune who flourished before the British occupation of India.

The Contemporary Review says:—"It would seem hardly possible to fill one volume with so many adventures. It is difficult to lay aside the book when once it is opened."

THE INDIAN COUNTRY SIDE.

By PERCIVAL C. SCOTT O'CONNOR.

With 40 Illustrations from Photographs by the Author.

Large crown 8vo, 6s. net.

GOING THROUGH THE MILL.

By Mrs. GERALD PAGET.

5s. net.

"There is much humour in the book; there are also varied types of character and life; while a genial mood pervades its seriousness and commends it to the reader."—Times.

AUCTION BRIDGE.

By VANE PENNELL.

2s. 6d. net.

NEW FICTION. 6s. each.

When a new novel by an unknown writer is accorded the honour of a leading article in a prominent morning paper, and a column review in the SPECTATOR it is safe to say that the book must be a remarkable one. The SPECTATOR speaks of "an ingenious and spirited romance, a picturesque imagination, and a style far above the average." The LIVERPOOL DAILY POST devotes a whole leading article to "A New Novelist! A novelist of rare gift and power!"

The story thus handled is

THE BROTHERHOOD OF WISDOM.

By FRANCES J. ARMOUR.

FAITHFUL UNFAITHFUL.

By FRED. WYNNE, Author of "Fortune's Fool."

AN ENGAGEMENT OF CONVENIENCE.

By LOUIS ZANGWILL.

FOLLOW UP!

A Story of Harrow School. By ARCHIBALD DOUGLAS FOX.

Mr. LACON WATSON'S two amusing books, BENEDICTINE and REFLECTIONS OF A HOUSEHOLDER, are now ready in new and cheaper form, paper boards with coloured cover design, at 1s. net each.

"It is a compliment to the much-maligned tribe of the general reader that a second edition has been called for of Mr. E. H. Lacon Watson's genial sketches of married life, which he calls 'Benedictine.' In their new and revised edition (Brown Langham & Co., 1s. net) they make a sober-looking, tasteful volume, which is wonderfully cheap when we consider the humour and literary quality of the writing."—Pall Mall Gazette.

BROWN LANGHAM & CO., LTD.

NEW BOOKS.

NEW WORLDS FOR OLD.

A Complete Exposition of the Socialist idea.

By H. G. WELLS.

6/-

The Daily News says:—"Mr. Wells puts his case in a sane, practical manner which should show the opponents of Socialism that they are not dealing with dreamers or fanatics, but have a reasoned view of society which they must confront with reason and with an alternative."

The Pall Mall Gazette says:—"The charm of Mr. Wells' style makes the reading of any work he produces a pleasure, and the sanity of his thinking prevents the warmth of his feelings leading him into those excesses which are too commonly indulged in by writers on both sides of the socialistic question."

The Westminster Gazette says:—"We have seldom read a book from which an honest reader could get a more wholesome moral stimulus than 'New Worlds for Old'."

The Daily Telegraph says:—"New Worlds for Old" contains much that must give any intelligent thinker pause. As a piece of socio-political journalism it invites the attention of every citizen in the nation."

ICE-BOUND HEIGHTS OF THE MUSTAGH.

An Account of Pioneer Exploration and High Climbing in the Baltistan Himalaya. By FANNY BULLOCK WORKMAN and WILLIAM HUNTER WORKMAN, M.A. With 2 Maps and 170 Illustrations. 21/- net.

MY SCHOOL AND MY GOSPEL.

By Sir HUBERT VON HERKOMER, C.V.O., R.A. With 2 Coloured, 4 Photogravure, and over 40 Half-tone Illustrations. 21/- net.

THE SOUL OF SPAIN.

By HAVELOCK ELLIS.

Demy 8vo. 7/6 net.

LETTERS FROM THE RAVEN.

Correspondence of Lafcadio Hearn. Edited by MILTON BRONNER.

5/- net.

THE SYMBOLIST MOVEMENT IN LITERATURE.

By ARTHUR SYMONS. New Edition. 5/- net.

ROMANTIC TALES FROM THE PANJAB.

With Indian Night's Entertainment. Collected by Rev. CHARLES SWYNNERTON. New Edition. 6/- net.

LETTERS FROM INDIA.

By A. W. STRATTON, sometime Registrar of Panjab University, and Principal of Oriental College. With a Memoir by his Wife, and Introduction by Professor BLOOMFIELD. Illustrated.

10/6 net.

NEW POEMS.

By ST. JOHN LUCAS. Crown

8vo. 5/- net.

THE BOOK, ITS HISTORY AND DEVELOPMENT.

By CYRIL DAVENPORT, V.D. Illustrated. 6/- net.

Six-Shilling Novels.

THE ANCIENT LAW - ELLEN GLASGOW.

Author of "The Deliverance."

THE DAUGHTER - CONSTANCE SMEDLEY.

Author of "Conflict."

THE BURNING CRESSET - HOWARD PRASE.

A romance of "the 1715" by the Author of "Magnus Sinclair."

MR. TUCKERMAN'S NIECES - HELEN BROWN.

A comedy of home life.

A COMEDY OF MOODS - GREVILLE H. TEMPANY.

A humorous story by a new writer.

 Readers who consider that Prospectuses of any of the above volumes would be of interest are invited to apply for same to—

ARCHIBALD CONSTABLE & CO., LTD.

10 ORANGE STREET, W.C.

are never so trying as small sections of them appear to be in pictures.

To sum up. This is an excellent piece of book-making, by one of the greatest living masters of rock-craft and an expert on snow and ice. But it is not great literature, and it will not rank among the mountaineering classics.

A NOVEL OF TEMPERAMENT.*

WHEN we say that a writer has temperament we have defined the most indispensable of the many qualities, knowledge, insight, technical mastery, &c., essential to the artist. Without the last all the rest run to waste, but without "temperament" the artist is little better than a skilled artisan, as we may see on a visit to most of our public art galleries. In "Rachel Chalfont," Miss Sophie Cole shows that she possesses in a marked degree this mysterious quality of temperament, and it is equally patent that the defects of her novel arise from her having forced her imagination to supply deficiencies in experience and knowledge. It is a fault common to beginners, and only time which brings knowledge can correct it. And the reason why so many lights of the romantic school have sunk quickly out of sight is that our generation can find no solid bones and flesh of reality underneath the velvet robe and picturesque habiliments of romance.

As temperament gives the individual feeling that a true work of art transmits to the nerves of the audience, the originality of the appeal made to us is of vital importance. Everything in human life is but the flow and transmutation of the old elements, but the artist who is obviously inspired, at second hand, by the style or outlook of another mind, sins against the primary law which asks of art that it shall conceal its origins. If the temperament is borrowed, then the feeling loses the original purity: we say "a poem in the Tennysonian manner," and we damn it by this definition. If, indeed, a piece of art reproduces too often and too insistently the creator's mannerisms, our nerves grow tired, and cease to transmit to us a shock of pleasure. Thus it is that a Turner or a Swinburne loses his power over us, or we become fatigued by Bernard Shaw's paradoxical brilliancy. We know beforehand what the temperament will give us: we are neither surprised nor interested. And it is for this reason that we are always grateful for the original work of every beginner, because the quality in it is virginal, and the sensation it causes us is fresher than that communicated by the work of abler, more experienced men with whom we are already too familiar. And this is the difficulty of estimating the work of a newcomer: according to our individual bias the scale is weighed down by the value of the freshness of the revelation, or flies up through the obvious imperfection or crudity of the actual performance.

Charlotte Brontë's "Jane Eyre" is a classic example of how far temperament may go in supplying deficiencies due to lack of experience. There is a great deal of melodramatic absurdity in the novel, but the force of imagination buoys us up even in Rochester's most Byronic moments. And similarly Miss Sophie Cole's power of feeling is so real as to make us put up with, if not accept, the unreality of her hero, the "great novelist," Stephen Imrie. We perceive that the important thing is the girl's, Rachel Chalfont's, feeling about the man, and that whether the man himself is an idealised figure is of minor importance. For, as in the case of "Jane Eyre," it is the intensity of the heroine's inner life that counts, and of that sweet and bitter delirium of youth when the walls of a dusty school-room, and the repression of an unsympathetic governess, can raise more passionate turmoil in the heart than can all the fruit of belated desire pressed on the dulled palate of middle age. "Rachel Chalfont" is a success at least in calling back to the memory of people, who are fed with a satiety of the things within their reach, those days of youthful fasting when what they craved for seemed to elude the grasp of their hands so eager to pluck and taste. It is not, however, the case that the intensity of Rachel Chalfont's inner life places the other characters of the story in the position of fitting phantoms. Several are drawn with force and insight, and among these we may mention the mother, Mrs.

Chalfont, and the middle-aged woman who is Rachel's rival in the affections of the novelist, Stephen Imrie.

Among the dozen scenes or so of real value in this extremely promising book we may mention the scene of the fruitlessly bitter conversation between Rachel's father and mother, which is overheard by the child at night. In the mind of a sensitive child the relations of the elder people in a household one to another are nearly always a thing for silent wonderment and brooding curiosity, and Miss Cole has caught very cleverly the particular blend of childish awe, indifference, and acceptance in Rachel Chalfont's mind in regard to the secret unhappiness of her mother. Not less delicately done is the curious relationship between Rachel and her elderly cynical "friend," the artist, Mr. Sylvester, whose aim in such "friendships" "was not, as a rule, the seduction of the body, but rather the more subtle desire to enervate and hold captive the mind." In Chapters X. and XI. the author paints with much delicacy the dawning alarm, and later, the agony of shame, in the girl's mind when Sylvester's touch and look has revealed the toils that are closing round her. This feminine purity of a deep nature to which everything else but love undefined is a sacrilege is very well indicated, and Sylvester himself, sensual but not gross, is a clever character study. The first third of "Rachel Chalfont," indeed, is in many ways remarkable, while the second third, where Rachel falls in love with the idealised "great novelist," Stephen Imrie, is immature, and weak in execution. It is curious to note how the insight of many clever women does not serve them to penetrate into masculine character till experience opens their eyes. Stephen Imrie is not a real man at all, though nothing could be more real than the thoughts of the two women about him, the two women who become his slaves, Rachel and her rival, Mrs. Raeburn. Here, again, we have a most subtle sketch of the relations between this cool and hard woman of the world, who is nevertheless craving for the love of the weak man Imrie, who has offered her his "friendship," and the girl Rachel, who, untaught by experience, rates the powers of her love higher than would any woman. The best scene in the book is the one in the nursing home in Porchester Square, where Mrs. Raeburn, after an unsuccessful operation that kills her, confides to her rival the bitter longings of her unappeased passion. There is great depth of feeling here and delicacy of touch, and if the writer who can strike so deeply into the roots of feminine love should succeed in freeing her work from the elements of unreality and melodrama which here and there disfigure it, she should give us something of high merit.

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

THE tumultuous period of the wars of the Fronde is one of the most bewildering, though by no means the least fascinating, period in French history. Ever since Dumas exploited its dramatic interest it has been explored by a host of writers, so that in writing "A Princess of Intrigue: Madame de Longueville and her Times" (Hutchinson, 2 vols., 24s. net), Mr. H. Noel Williams had plenty of materials to draw from. Mr. Williams has made a close study of these materials, but so complicated and interwoven were the threads of the policy followed by Mazarin and his opponents, and so varied were the motives of the chief actors in that extraordinary drama, that it is almost impossible to present them in a narrative which would be free from obscurity. These difficulties have, however, been largely overcome in this spirited biography of the famous Frondeuse. The reader who is deterred by the voluminous pages of Victor Cousin and Sainte-Beuve will find in Mr. Williams's two volumes an adequate and graphic account of Madame de Longueville's life and times. Even in an age of famous women, Anne Geneviève de Bourbon, Duchess of Longueville, was famed both for beauty and for skill in affairs. Mazarin said that she was one of the three women in France who could either govern or overthrow a kingdom, and the words were hardly an exaggeration. Born in the castle of Vincennes, where her father was a prisoner, and inclined to piety by the early misfortunes of her family, especially the execution of her uncle Montmorency, she went to her first ball wearing a hair-shirt beneath her finery, and at the age of thirty-four she came under the Port-Royal influence,

* "Rachel Chalfont." By Sophie Cole. Duckworth & Co. 6s.

SMITH, ELDER, & CO.'S NEW BOOKS

Just Published. With Portraits and Maps. Demy 8vo. 14s. net.

MEMOIRS OF FIELD-MARSHAL
SIR HENRY WYLIE NORMAN,G.C.B., &c. By Sir WILLIAM LEE-WARNER, K.C.S.I., Author of "The Protected Princes of India," "Life of the Marquis of Dalhousie," K.T., &c.

NEW VOLUME OF THE "WATERLOO LIBRARY."

ADAM GRIGSON.By Mrs. HENRY DE LA PASTURE.
Author of "Peter's Mother," &c. NEW EDITION. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. [Just published.]BRITISH SOCIALISM: An Examination of its Doctrines,
Policy, Aims, and Practical Proposals. By J. ELLIS BARKER, Author of "Modern Germany," "The Rise and Decline of the Netherlands," &c. 10s. 6d. net.The Daily Mail says:—"No review could do justice to this admirable book: the reader should buy or borrow it and study it for himself."ENGLISH SOCIALISM OF TO-DAY:Its Teaching and its Aims Examined. By the Right Hon. H. O.
ARNOLD-FORSTER, M.P. SECOND EDITION. 2s. 6d. net.Daily Telegraph.—"A book which deserves and which we hope to see attain the very widest circulation."IDLEHURST: A Journal kept in the Country.By JOHN HALSHAM, Author of "Lonewood Corner," etc. New and Cheaper Edition. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.The Saturday Review, noticing the first edition, said:—"Idle-hurst' is one of the most beautiful idylls in English."NEW SIX SHILLING NOVELS.*THE ALIEN SISTERS. By Mrs.PERCY DEARMER.
Author of "The Difficult Day," "Brownjohn's," &c.Morning Post.—"A remarkable book, full of many passages of real beauty, showing great powers of observation and insight."DAN RIACH: SOCIALIST.By the Author of "MISS MOLLY." Just Published.

London: SMITH, ELDER & CO., 15, Waterloo Place, S.W.

SIR HUBERT VON HERKOMER and PUBLIC OPINIONSir Hubert Herkomer, the distinguished artist, writing from Bushey
to the Editor of PUBLIC OPINION, says, on February 11th, 1908:—

Dear Sir—It gives me great pleasure to tell you how your paper, PUBLIC OPINION, answers a purpose in my life. Although I read a great deal, I find it impossible to keep abreast of the trend of higher thought that is going on around me, which can only be gathered from various articles and letters in the newspapers, and articles in magazines. But your paper gives me the assurance that I miss nothing which could be of use to me in the train of thought upon which I may just be engaged, and seldom does a weekly issue of PUBLIC OPINION appear from which I cannot cull some useful suggestion. As a lecturer on art, I need all the suggestions on life that I can get into my hands, for I treat art in all its phases popularly. From PUBLIC OPINION I get to know certain modern authors with whose methods of thinking I am in sympathy, and those I follow up further. Your paper does me the service to point to them.

Your selection of current thought is worthy of all praise, for it gives one the wholesome feeling that the world is after all not going to the devil, but contains thinkers and good men and women.

I wish you with all my heart continuous success with your paper.

Yours very truly,

(Sgd.) HUBERT VON HERKOMER.

PUBLIC OPINION.A Weekly Review of Current Thought and Activity.
EVERY FRIDAY. TWOPENCE.

Edited by PERCY L. PARKER.

The purpose of PUBLIC OPINION is to provide information by means of a weekly review of current thought and activity as they are expressed in the world's newspapers, magazines and books, and to put on record the ideas and activities which make for religious, political and social progress.

PUBLIC OPINION can be obtained from any Newsagent or Bookstall, or will be sent post free for one year to any address in the United Kingdom for 10s. 10d.; and to any place abroad for 13s. per annum. Orders should be addressed to—

PUBLIC OPINION,

30 & 31, Temple House, Tallis St., London, E.C.

Specimens free on application.

PERCY L. PARKER.

Mr. Eveleigh Nash's New Books.

THE LAST OF THE BEAUX.

NOW READY.—With numerous Illustrations, demy 8vo, 10s. net.

BEAU BRUMMELL & HIS TIMES

By ROGER BOUTEL DE MONVEL.

To read the story of Brummell's Life is to become acquainted with a personality unique in the annals of Dandyism. This delightful volume, written in an entertaining and vivacious manner, gains an added charm by the illuminating and picturesque introductory chapter on "DRESS AND THE DANDIES," which MARY CRAVEN, the author of "Famous Beauties," has written.

NOW READY.

THE DIARY OF A LOOKER-ON

By C. LEWIS HIND. Large crown 8vo, 7s. 6d.

LIFE IN THE GOLDEN WEST.

NOW READY.—Completely Revised, with New Chapters added, demy 8vo, with Illustrations, 7s. 6d. net.

SPORT AND LIFE ON THE PACIFIC SLOPE.

By HORACE ANNESLEY VACHELL.

Mr. Vachell's reminiscences of California are of real interest and value. For seventeen years he studied the conditions of life and enjoyed the sport out West. He gives us in this entertaining volume a vivid picture of the country, and useful hints to intending sportsmen.

AN IMPORTANT WORK ON

VOLTAIRE, MONTESQUIEU AND ROUSSEAU IN ENGLAND.

By J. CHURTON COLLINS.

Professor of English Literature in the University of Birmingham.
NOW READY.—Demy 8vo, Illustrated, 7s. 6d. net.

Professor Churton Collins throws much new light upon singularly interesting episodes connected with the visits of these great French men of letters to England.

IMPORTANT NEW FICTION.—NOW READY.—Crown 8vo, 6s. each.

MR. FORD MADOX HUEFFER'S SPLENDID NEW HISTORICAL ROMANCE.*THE FIFTH QUEEN CROWNED.

Mr. Hueffer's reputation as a writer of historical novels is international. In his picturesque and brilliant style he draws to a worthy conclusion the fascinating study of Katherine Howard, and the reader cannot fail to follow with deepest interest the closing events in the life of this beautiful heroine, who with a light step and a smile on her lips went to the tragic fulfilment of her destiny.

FAR FROM THE MADDING CROWD.

PEDLAR'S PACK.

By OLIVE ONIONS, Author of "Admiral Eddy," &c.

A Second Large Edition is Now Ready of

THE THIEF ON THE CROSS.

By Mrs. HAROLD GORST, Author of "This Our Sister," &c.

This is a trenchant and realistic story of slum life—far more powerful in its conception and definite in its purpose than anything Mrs. Gorst has yet written.

Second Edition Now Ready of

THE MILLIONAIRE GIRL.

By "RITA," Author of "Peg the Rake," &c.

"Equal to anything the author has done."—Manchester Courier.

A Fine New Novel by the Author of "The Wondrous Wife."

THE KISS OF HELEN.

By CHARLES MARRIOTT, Author of "The Wondrous Wife," &c.

"The best novel Mr. Marriott has written since 'The Column'."
—Daily Graphic.

A Novel on Divorce and Mrs. Grundy.

By the author of "As in a Looking Glass."

THE DEAN AND HIS DAUGHTER.

By F. C. PHILLIPS, Author of "As in a Looking Glass."

A powerful novel illustrating the cruelty with which the world treats a divorced woman.

Second Large Edition of

THE WORST MAN IN THE WORLD.

By FRANK RICHARDSON, "Author of '2835 Mayfair,'" &c.

"As full of witticisms and as irrepressible as ever."—Times."Extremely funny. . . . A feast of fun and frolic."—Daily Telegraph.

"Once again and more, we think, than ever he will be found irresistible."—Pall Mall Gazette.

MARK ALSTON.

By J. A. C. SYKES, Author of "Algernon Casterton."

This novel is an impression of events in the life of John Ruskin. Neatly written and interesting. . . . thoughtful, graceful, and always earnest. . . . the book cannot fail to attract readers interested in the personality which it depicts so sympathetically."—Scotsman.

CAPTAIN SPINK.

By MORLEY ROBERTS, Author of "The Promotion of the Admiral."

"Every page is full of entertainment."—Globe."He is something of a joy."—Evening Standard.

ILLUSTRATED LIST POST-FREE.

FAWSIDE HOUSE, KING ST., COVENT GARDEN, LONDON, W.C.

and gave herself up entirely to religion. But from the moment when she first took part in affairs until her retirement she was one of the most conspicuous and powerful figures in the history of her country. Quarrelling and making up with her brother, the great Condé, intriguing with Turenne, flouting Mazarin and Anne of Austria, making De Retz her tool, or dictating terms to the Court, her career is one of absorbing interest. Her marriage to the Duc de Longueville, when she was twenty-three and her husband forty-seven, and as Sainte-Beuve says, "veuf d'une princesse de plus de vertu que d'esprit," was an uncongenial one, and her great passion was her love for La Rochefoucauld. It was this love which awoke her ambition and led her into the cabals of the Fronde. Her rebellious nature betrayed itself even in her retirement from the world, for she threw in her lot with the Port-Royalists, and it was her Jansenism that prevented Bossuet from adding her to that famous gallery whose funeral orations he preached. Her protection was of incalculable value to Port-Royal. She died in 1679, and less than a month afterwards the great abbey was forbidden to receive any more postulants or pupils. Mr. Williams's account of her career is a useful piece of work. For those who wish to get an outline of the history of France under Mazarin and Anne of Austria the book can be heartily recommended.

* * *

THE latest issue in Messrs. Jack's pleasant "Golden Poets" series (2s. 6d. net) is a volume of selections from Browning, prefaced by an introduction from the pen of Mr. Augustine Birrell. In making this selection Mr. Birrell declares that he has been "supremely selfish," consulting no taste but his own. Most readers will probably agree with the choice made, for, excepting some poems still covered by copyrights, the best of Browning is contained in this little volume. Mr. Birrell recalls that thirty years ago he gave battle to those who declared Browning to be unreadable—a group that included such weighty names as Edward Fitzgerald, Tennyson, and Matthew Arnold. Time has sifted Browning's poetry in some degree, and though much of his verse is forgotten, Mr. Birrell is right in declaring that a good fraction of it will always be remembered. "You can never get rid of Browning at his best. There he will be, in the thick of life; appearing in books, emerging in conversation, on the lips of lovers, in the sermons of divines, in moments of eager emotion, and in times of sorrow. He is for all moods, save perhaps those of dull depression." A most interesting comparison is drawn between Browning and Cowley. There is in each the same extensive and varied learning, the same prolixity, and the same obscurity arising from close-packed thought. "You can hardly keep Browning out of your head whilst reading what Johnson has to say about Cowley. When, e.g., Johnson bids us remember that to write as Cowley did, it was at least necessary to read and think; that his (Cowley's) strength always appears in his agility; that his volubility is not the fluttering of a light, but the bound of an elastic mind, we cannot but recall Browning; nor can we truthfully deny that it was our poet's fault no less than Cowley's to pursue his thoughts to their last ramifications—thus losing, adds Johnson, 'the grandeur of generality.'" The book contains illustrations in colour by Mr. Edmund Sullivan.

* * *

WE fear that "Sunny Days in Italy" (Werner Laurie, 10s. 6d. net), by Miss Elise Lathrop, must be added to the swollen list of superfluous books on that much bewritten land. The authoress is an American lady, who appears to have spent some little time at Pisa, studying the language, and a good deal less time at each of the many Italian towns she visited. Her preface states that she has endeavoured to see as much of truly Italian life as is possible for the foreigner, but the result does not show that she saw very much more than one expects from the average tourist in a hurry. She entered Italy, orthodox fashion, by Milan, while Verona was her last stopping place. She "did" the Lakes, Genoa, Rome, Florence, Naples, and Venice; but her recorded observation of the people in all these places and others does not go much beyond the comparative criticism of their cabmen, beggars, hotels, and would-be guides, on all of which previous books have descanted in full. The Italian lower classes treat their saints with familiarity, and are badly addicted to the habit of expectoration. Upper class courtship is conducted under difficulties that the Anglo-Saxon does not know. The young women of Pisa are "lacking in style." Such were some of the native characteristics that impressed her. It requires perhaps a Transatlantic courage to describe Or S. Michele, in Florence, as having been "built for business purposes," and Juliet's tomb at Verona as "like a large bath-tub"! She is wrong, by the way, in saying that Or S. Michele was "transformed into a church in the early part of the fourteenth century." It was already a parish church in 1100 A.D. However, Miss Lathrop picked up a few facts about university education at Pisa, and witnessed a general strike in Rome, and the rest of her rather breathless narrative is bright enough and sufficiently well illustrated to please those who have observed Italy in the same fashion as herself.

* * *

WE heartily welcome a revised and enlarged edition of Mr. Vincent Smith's "Early History of India" (Clarendon Press, 14s.). The work has already become the recognised text-book for all students of Indian history, and is one of the most remarkable productions of Anglo-Indian scholarship. The difficulties that confront a writer on the subject are quite unusual, for very few civilisations have such scanty contemporary records as the Indian. Of written history the student has hardly anything to depend upon outside the story of Alexander's invasion, a few inscribed columns, and the notes of a Chinese traveller or two. India has no chronicle, and few dates can be fixed, except approximately, until the establishment of the Mohammedan power, at which point Mr. Vincent Smith's history ends. The course of India's development for nearly 2,000 years has mainly to be conjectured from unwritten evidences, and the extreme difficulty of such a process makes Mr. Vincent Smith's success all the more notable.

* * *

PROFESSOR PFLEIDERER is well known as one of the most learned of German theologians, and many readers will welcome the English translation of his course of lectures on the different forms of religious belief contained in "Religion and Historic Faiths" (Fisher Unwin, 5s. net). Professor Pfeleiderer's view is that the earlier religions are steps in the way towards a fuller apprehension of divine truth. He therefore writes of these earlier beliefs with sympathy, pointing out the elements in them that have survived in the gradual process by which religion has rid itself of "the impurities left over from the childhood period of the race." The study of comparative religion, he says, teaches us to understand our own religion better because it helps us to differentiate between the essential and the accidental, the permanent and the temporary. His book forms an admirable introduction to this subject of comparative religion which is daily receiving more and more recognition even from the most orthodox school of theologians.

* * *

"SALT AND SINCERITY," by Mr. Arthur L. Humphreys (Wells Gardner & Co., 3s. 6d. net), consists of extracts from that useful periodical, "Books of To-day and To-morrow," dealing with a large variety of subjects. The extracts are short and make pleasant reading, though in many cases Mr. Humphreys leaves off just as he warms to his subject. We wish, for instance, that he had given us some more of his views on "Humour in Women" or on "Lists of Books." He dismisses both these themes in a few sentences, but perhaps he is of opinion that salt and sincerity alike should be administered in small doses.

* * *

To the new edition of Mr. H. Morse Stephens's volume on "Portugal" in the "Story of the Nations" series (Fisher Unwin, 5s. net), Major Martin Hume contributes a chapter carrying on the history of the country from 1891 to the present year. The results attending Franco's unfortunate influence over Carlos I. are dealt with, and Major Hume points out the effect which the monetary transactions between the Dictator and the King had in inflaming popular indignation, though he describes the Dictatorship as "a misguided experiment in well-meant despotism." He ends by regretting that Portugal is doomed to enter once again the vicious

Books of the Day

Now Ready

The collaboration of these two well-known authors has produced a novel which will appeal to all lovers of the sensational, and especially to those who require "artistic verisimilitude" in their sensation. In this story millionaires work the complex problems of European finance, and a Prime Minister and his Cabinet manoeuvre to bring about a war between France and Germany. 6s.

This volume is a handy guide for gardeners, amateurs and otherwise, by the well-known author of "Beautiful Gardens," Mr. Walter P. Wright. If the gardener does not know or forgets how to spell the name of a plant, or what soil it likes, or whether it is propagated by seeds or cuttings, this is the very work, with its numerous useful illustrations, to put him right. 3s. 6d. net.

This is a new practical series of Agricultural Handbooks written by Mr. Primrose McConnell, B.Sc., F.G.S., &c. The first volume, on the Nature and Management of Soils, is now ready. Paper covers 1s. net; cloth 1s. 6d. net.

Two Books of Practical Value Just Published.

The Townsman's Farm

By "Home Counties"
Author of "The Case for the Goat," &c. 6s. net.

The work deals in a practical way with the cultivation of the land for pleasure or profit, and gives an account of the working of a number of actual farms and holdings and the profits obtained. The author has taken pains to show the townsman the realities of rural existence.

CASSELL AND CO. LTD., LA BELLE SAUVAGE, LONDON, E.C.

Gardening for Women

By the Hon. Frances Wolseley
Illustrated. 5s. net.

A practical guide on these lines has long been needed, as horticulture as a means of occupation for women is on the increase. Contains full practical guidance for women who desire to adopt gardening as a profession, with complete syllabuses of the various centres of learning at home and abroad.

The Statue

BY

Eden Phillpotts and Arnold Bennett

*

Cassell's A B C of Gardening

*

The Complete Farmer

VOL. I.—SOILS

30th MARCH TO 16th APRIL.

MUDIE'S ANNUAL CLEARANCE SALE OF BOOKS

¶ A wide selection of recent popular Works in excellent second-hand condition, or re-bound equal to new, at from 6d. per volume.

¶ Standard Works in every description of useful and ornamental binding, at less than cost of binding.

FOR VARIETY OF CHOICE AND CHEAPNESS THIS SALE IS UNIQUE.

Write for Catalogue and post orders EARLY to secure the best bargains.

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY, Ltd.,
30-34, NEW OXFORD STREET, W.C.

Branches:—241, Brompton Road, S.W.; 48, Queen Victoria Street, E.C.

A COMPLETE TRAVEL LIBRARY of over 1,000 PAGES

More than 500 beautiful photographic illustrations, including reproductions of valuable old maps and prints.

The above series of Travel Books may be obtained by sending stamps or P.O. for 2/6 to the Superintendent of the Line, Paddington Station, London, W.

JAMES C. INGLIS, General Manager.

G. W. R.

For 2/6 POST
FREE

PROCLAIMED BY THE PRESS
TO BE THE NE PLUS ULTRA
OF RAILWAY LITERATURE.

THE DAILY TELEGRAPH says:

"Wholly admirable pictures and brightly-written letterpress well fulfil their purpose."

THE SPHERE says:

"There is not a single point of interest omitted."

THE WORLD says:

"The literary matter is of considerable merit, and the illustrations are admirable."

MADAME says:

"Both dainty and artistic, containing a mine of information written in the proper spirit of appreciation."

THE INDEX TO VOLUME I. OF THE NATION

Is NOW READY, and can be had free on application to the Manager.

SATURDAY WESTMINSTER

CARTOONS BY "F.C.G."
SHORT STORIES,
BOOK REVIEWS,
LITERARY ARTICLES,
PROBLEMS AND PRIZES,
SURVEY OF THE WEEK,
BRIDGE, CHESS, PHOTOGRAPHY,
NATURE AND SCIENCE,
Etc., Etc.

(One Penny Weekly.)

NOTICE.

THE NATION is published weekly. Applications for copies and Subscriptions should be sent to THE NATION Office, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent Garden.

Terms of Subscription, Including Postage:

HOME, 26s. PER ANNUM. FOREIGN, 30s. PER ANNUM.

Cheques should be made payable to THE MANAGER, THE NATION, and crossed "National Provincial Bank."

Telephone No. Gerrard 4035.

Telegrams: "Nationetta," London.

THE NATION may be obtained from the following book-sellers abroad:—

Paris—Galignani's Library, Rue de Rivoli.

Paris—W. H. Smith & Son Bookshop, 248, Rue de Rivoli.

Nice—Galignani's Library.

Stockholm—Norden and Jephson.

Vienna—Mr. William Frick, Graben 27.

circle of corrupt political parties until her people shall gain enlightenment sufficient to take an intelligent part in the government of their country.

* * *

THE authoress of "Ceylon: The Paradise of Adam," by Caroline Corner (John Lane, 10s. 6d. net), did not spend her seven years on the island entirely behind the doors of the "Grecian Temple set up in the Garden of Eden," which is the modest way she describes her first bungalow. She travelled about, saw things, and noted them with the keenness of a lady journalist, and with eyes that did not shrink from investigating the mysteries even of her own Singhalese-conducted kitchen. We read much of devil dances, and other mystic rites, which she attended with feminine intrepidity, of Dhurzees and Muttas, and the Vedda aboriginal, who never smiles, of opium dens and courts of justice. She went "up country" and picnicked in the jungle, as health or the spirit of adventure demanded. The narrative, which is given pleasantly in the third person, with "Cynthia," a young married lady, as the heroine, includes one or two stories of the "fiction based on fact" type; and the whole is flavoured with a sprinkling of occultism. The authoress excels, perhaps, in her character studies of native servants. She is happily free from the habit of mind, not uncommon to Europeans, that represents the subject people as either too funny or too beastly. The only celebrity she encountered was Arabi Pasha, who was then in exile in Ceylon. The book is feminine in the stress it lays on details that might seem superfluous to a man in search of a country's character, but its human sympathy and vivacity of style carry one easily to the end. There are some good photographs of scenery and native types.

The Week in the City.

THE Stock Markets, on the whole, have been buoyant during the last week under the lead of Americans. A large dealer in the foreign market, where quotations have also been rising, told me that the buying was mainly professional—in advance of the public, who are thought to be just on the point of investing. Possibly in the American Market the improvement may induce heavy liquidation, but I don't think we shall see again the low quotations of the winter. There is, however, an air of distrust about the telegrams from New York, which should inculcate caution. Argentine investments seem to be great favourites just now; the splendid crops have created unusual prosperity, and railway traffics have been swollen. On the other hand, there have been some serious commercial failures in Buenos Ayres, and political conditions are not satisfactory. It is possible, therefore, that investments in that part of South America may not prove remunerative. Trade, I am afraid, is still ebbing all the world over; but it is some satisfaction to note that the worst depression is in the production of luxuries, such as diamonds, pearls, silks, and motor cars. The wool and cotton trades are also on the down grade, both at home and on the Continent. All the towns of Canada and the United States teem with unemployed workmen, and the German cities are suffering from the same complaint.

CHEAPER FOOD.

At the beginning of the year many speculators were still inclined to look for higher prices as spring advanced, calculating that the shortage of the world's wheat crop would be seriously felt before the new harvest commenced. But they were mistaken, and many who backed their opinions were half ruined. Three factors, it has been said, stand out more or less prominently just now in any forecast of the world's wheat prospects. The first of these is the weather, the second a somewhat surprising decrease in consumptive demand, and the third an enlarged estimate of the available wheat exports from Argentina. These three influences have shaken the confidence of those who looked for a general advance in breadstuffs during the spring. "Disappointment at the failure to make gains," writes the "Wall Street Journal" about the "tired bulls" in the grain market, "has led many to consider the whole statistical position of the trade, as well as to re-examine the underlying conditions." Probably what has most upset calculations has been the extent to which the high price of wheat brings substitutes into play, such as barley, rye, oats, maize, potatoes, beans, &c. Oats have been cheaper this year than in the early part of either 1907 or 1906. Wheat is still considerably above the average of last year or the year before, but it is much about what it was in 1904-5.

AN AMERICAN JUDGMENT AND "THE PAWNBROKER BANKER."

The confusion as to what are the proper functions of a banker has caused much loss in the United States, but it is now being cleared up. One is glad to see that the following observations of Judge Anderson, in passing sentence at Chicago on J. R. Walsh, have been widely quoted in the American Press:—

"The banker was lost in the promoter, the speculator, the railroad man. The evidence clearly establishes this. He owed a duty to the bank, his master. He attempted to serve those other interests, the other masters. To my mind, there has been, in recent times, no clearer demonstration of the statement that a man who is a banker ought to be nothing but a banker, and that until at least those bankers who own and manage national banks understand that when they serve their bank they cannot serve other interests—until that idea prevails cases like this will probably continue to arise."

In commenting on this case, the "Chicago Journal" declares that this kind of banker was responsible for the crisis:—

"Some New York banks were used improperly by Stock Exchange gamblers, who got control of them for that purpose. Their deposits were risked in speculation and lost, with the result that the banks were crippled. They had plenty of securities, such as they were, but no money; and when depositors demanded cash the banks closed."

The business world has not, however, done its full duty, in the opinion of the "Chicago Journal," nor will it be secured from similar crises so long as "the pawnbroker banker" is tolerated in financial institutions. The pawnbroker banker, we are told, is so eager to earn an extra one-half per cent. in dividends that he lends almost every dollar that comes into his possession in the form of deposits, thus violating the provision that banks shall keep a reserve of at least twenty-five per cent. to meet the cheques of customers.

THE WORLD'S COPPER SUPPLY.

Copper is coming to be regarded as an even better barometer than iron of trade and business; certainly it is a better barometer of speculation and speculative enterprise. According to Mr. Harvey Weed, one of the first authorities on the subject, there are at present (in spite of the world-wide distribution of the metal) only about 250 active copper mines, of which 58 are in the United States. The total output is about 100,000 tons per annum. After the United States, which heads the list of producers, come Mexico and Spain. The three greatest consumers of copper are the United States, Great Britain, and Germany. In 1906 the United States produced 55 per cent. of the world's total of 1,576,000,000 pounds of copper. The Anglo-Saxon race not only owns most of the world's gold mines, but owns and consumes most of the world's copper as well. In ten years the increase in the world's supply of copper has been 84 per cent., and the increase in production since 1899 has been due to development in the United States, Mexico, and Canada, though Russia may soon become an important contributor. The mines in the United States are, comparatively speaking, young, and are still in bonanza ore in the upper levels. The copper industry practically began in the United States in 1850, with 650 tons of total production, of which amount 572 tons came from Michigan. Arizona came into prominence in 1880, and Montana in 1883. Mr. Weed, in a recent interview, is reported to have observed—and his remarks may be useful to investors: "In America mining is done in prodigious haste, and according to European standards the mines are often robbed. A great output and a great dividend for a few years, rather than a moderate output and dividend for many years, is the difference between the European and American practice, justified in America by the great opportunities for reinvestment, or perhaps by the view that mining shares are not investments, but ventures."

LUCELLUM.

"Beautifully Cool and Sweet Smoking."

Player's

Navy Cut

Tobacco and Cigarettes

Sold only in the original
Packets and Tins, and may be obtained from all Stores
and Tobacconists of repute

0487.

Nervous Disorders

A deficiency of the phosphates causes a lowering of nervous tone, indicated by exhaustion, restlessness, headache or insomnia.

Horsford's Acid Phosphate

(Non-Alcoholic)

supplies the nerve cells with health-giving life force, restores strength and induces restful sleep without the use of dangerous drugs.

An Ideal Tonic in Nervous Diseases

If your chemist does not have it in stock he can obtain it from Bovril, Ltd., 152 Old Street, London, E. C.

BIRKBECK BANK

ESTABLISHED 1851.

SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, HIGH HOLBORN, W.C.

2½ per cent. INTEREST
allowed on Deposit Accounts.

2 per cent. INTEREST

on Drawing Accounts with Cheque Book.

All General Banking Business transacted.

ALMANACK, with full particulars, POST FREE.

C. F. RAVENSCROFT, Secretary.

BOVRIL REPELS

INFLUENZA

TANGYE

OIL ENGINE

AUTOMATIC
TUBE IGNITION.

NO LAMP
EXCEPT FOR STARTING.

TANGYES LTD
BIRMINGHAM.

CONNOISSEURS OF COFFEE DRINK THE

RED

WHITE

& BLUE

Delicious for Breakfast & after Dinner.

In making, use LESS QUANTITY, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

*For everyday
and everybody.*

Rowntree's
ELECT COCOA

HIGHEST QUALITY

TURKISH TOWELS

AND SIMILAR GOODS.

SOFT AND ABSORBENT.

THE "OSMAN" TURKISH TOWEL.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH SHEET.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH MAT.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH GOWN.

THE "OSMAN" Turkish Goods enumerated here are an absolute necessity in every household. They are a luxury, but not expensive, and can be obtained at prices within reach of every one. Be sure to buy the "Osman" brand and avoid imitations.

MADE BY
BARLOW & JONES LIMITED, MANCHESTER;
And Sold by all High-class Drapers and Upholsterers.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

OPPOSITE THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

THACKERAY'S HOTEL (Temperance),
GREAT RUSSELL STREET.

Passenger Lift. Electric Light in all Rooms. Bath-rooms on every floor. Spacious Dining-Drawing, Writing, Reading, Billiard and Smoking Rooms, heated throughout. All Floors Fire-proof. Perfect Sanitation. Night Porter. Telephone. BEDROOMS, including attendance, from 3/6 to 6/0. Full Tariff and Testimonials post free on application.
Telegraphic Address—"Thackeray, London."

FOREIGN HOTELS.

WIESBADEN.

HOTEL NASSAU. With fine Bathing Establishment. Situated at the Curplace. "The English Home."

ST. MORITZ, ENGADINE.

THE BELVEDERE. High-class English Family Hotel, in the finest and sunniest position. Inclusive terms 11 to 20 francs.

BOOKSELLERS.

THE LONDON BIBLE WAREHOUSE

Have the Largest Selection of Oxford and Other Bibles and Prayer Books from 6d. to £10.
53, PATERNOSTER ROW, E.C. Telephone Central 329.

I B L E S
Illustrated, Wide Margin, Interleaved, Teachers', Interlinear, Revised, and other Editions.

BOOKS. Ancient and Modern, Bought, Sold and Exchanged.

THOMAS THORP, 100, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.
[And at READING.]

MONTHLY CATALOGUES FREE.

Mr. Thorp has incorporated the business in Review Books carried on for many years by Mrs. Hindley at Booksellers' Row, and at the above address.

UNITARIANISM and THE NEW THEOLOGY.

EXPLANATORY PAMPHLETS SENT POST FREE.

UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION,

ESSEX HALL, ESSEX STREET, STRAND, W.C.

BOOK BARGAINS.—Harmsworth's Encyclopædia, last edition 10 vols., 25/-, cost £2 16s. net. Who's Who, 1907, 4/6, cost 11/- net. Burton's Arabian Nights, full edition, illustrated, 17 vols., £13 13s. Lear's Book of Nonsense, 2/6, pub. 6/. Balzac's Famous Novels in English, 40 vols., £3 3s. Oscar Wilde's Dorian Gray, 10/6. Pepys' Diary, 4 vols., 15/-, pub. £1 10s. G. P. R. James's Historical Novels, 25 vols., £2 2s. Encyclopædia Britannica, last edition, 35 vols., £12 12s. Business Cyclopædia and Legal Adviser, 6 vols., £1 4s., cost £2 8s. Catalogues free. Books bought. Special list of 3,000 books wanted post free. Libraries purchased for cash.—HOLLAND BROS., Book Merchants, 21, John Bright St., Birmingham.
[Books out of print supplied. Please state wants.]

TYPEWRITING.

TYPEWRITING.—Typewriting of every description, high-class work. Author's MSS. 10d. per thousand words, prompt, accurate. E. C. PEARCE, 30, College Road, Reading.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Curio Club
Bargains

Private persons desirous of disposing of antiques at bargain prices will find a ready sale for same at the "London Opinion Curio Club" 107, Regent Street, London, W.

FERTILISERS for HORTICULTURAL USE.—Write for descriptive price list; carriage paid for 4 cwt. and upwards.—Hy. Richardson & Comp., Manufacturers of Artificial Fertilisers, Skeldergate Bridge, York.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

LONDON.

WILD'S TEMPERANCE HOTELS. J. B. Wild, C.C., Man. Direc. 30-40, Ludgate Hill, E.C.; 70 & 71, Euston Square, W.C.

AT BOURNEMOUTH HYDRO.

IDEAL RESIDENCE.

Sun Lounge. Every form of Bath.

BOURNEMOUTH.

THE QUEEN, Bath Road. Miss Tye. Central. Board and Residence, 35/6 to 3 guineas weekly.

NEWLYN'S (Royal Exeter) HOTEL, Close Pier; 1st Class; Moderate.

SILVER HOW. Boarding Est. West Cliff Gdns. From 30s. week.

BRIDPORT (Near West Bay), DORSET.

BOARD RESIDENCE. Every Comfort. 10, West St., Bridport.

BRIGHTON.

THE HOTEL METROPOLE. E. Richard, Manager.

ROYAL YORK HOTEL. H. J. Preston.

BUXTON.

ST. ANN'S HOTEL. First Hotel.

DARTMOOR—YELVERTON.

THE TORS HOTEL. Tel.: 0199. Mrs. F. Sara.

BARON'S TEMPERANCE HOTEL. Magnificent Moor Views.

DEAL

BEACH HOUSE HOTEL. S. R. Jefferson.

EASTBOURNE.

CLARENCE Private Hotel & Boarding House, Sussex Grdns. 5/- day.

HADDON HALL, Devonshire Place, overlooking Sea. 5/- day.

EXETER.

DELLERS CAFE. Cathedral Close, and at Paignton.

GREAT YELDHAM—ESSEX.

THE WHITE HART HOTEL. Proprietor, W. Pearl.

HENLEY-ON-THAMES.

RED LION HOTEL. Overlooking famous Regatta course.

ILFRACOMBE.

COLLINGWOOD PRIVATE HOTEL. 120 Rooms. Facing Sea.

LEEDS.

HOTEL METROPOLE, 2 minutes' walk from either station.

LIVERPOOL.

COMPTON HOTEL, Church Street. Wm. Russell. Telegrams: "Compton." Telephone: 3032 Royal, 3 wires.

LLANELLY.

CLEVELAND HOTEL. J. T. Weaver.

MALDON.

TEMPERANCE HOTEL, Market Hill. C. Simons, Manager.

MALVERN.

HARDWICKE PRIVATE HOTEL. Prop. & M'g'r.—J. Wilson.

MANCHESTER.

THE PRINCES CAFE. Oxford Street.

THE DEANSGATE HOTEL. Deansgate.

MATLOCK.

SMEDLEY'S Hydropathic Establishment. Estab. 1853. H. Challand, Mnger.

ROCKSIDE HYDRO. Tennis, Bowls, &c. Nr. Golf Links. (18 holes).

OXFORD (near).

SUNNINGWELL HALL, Boars Hill. Dry, Sunny, Golf, etc. Lecture

PENTRE.

PENTRE HOTEL, Rhondda. Tel. No. P.O. 30. W. H. Miles.

PLYMOUTH.

GOODBODY'S CAFES. And at Torquay.

SWISS CAFE, Union Street. Moderate. Genoni Bros.

PORTSMOUTH.

SPEEDWELL HOTEL. A. Grigsby, Managing Director.

SOUTHSEA.

STRATHEARN MANSIONS, South Parade. Miss Collis, Manageress.

ST. MORITZ, ENGADINE.

BELVEDERE, high-class English Family Hotel. Situated in sunniest and finest position. Inclusive terms 11 to 20 francs.

SWANAGE.

"CRAIGSIDE," Board Residence. Tel.: 6. Misses Fell.

TEIGNMOUTH.

REGENT RESTAURANT & Criterion Hall for Catering. W. H. Bonner.

WHITBY.

WEST CLIFF PRIVATE HOTEL. Mrs. T. Newbitt.

WOODFORD GREEN, ESSEX.

WILFRED LAWSON. Temp. Hotel, J. J. Blundell Manager.

COUNTY OF LONDON.

The London County Council invites applications for the following posts in the Secondary Schools maintained by the Council. The candidates appointed will be required to commence work after the summer holidays, 1908.

A.—MASTERS.

School.	No. of assistants required.	Subjects which assistants would be required to teach.
Brockley Secondary School for Boys, Hillyfields, Brockley, S.E. ...	1	Should be specially qualified in French, and will also be required to act as Form Master.
Camden Secondary School for Boys, Hildrop Crescent, N. ...	1	English Subjects and German.

B.—ASSISTANT MISTRESSES.

School.	No. of assistants required.	Subjects which assistants will be required to teach.
Eltham Secondary School for Girls, Deansfield Road, West Hill... ..	1	English subjects in junior forms.
Fulham Secondary School for Girls, Dawes Road, Fulham	7	(1) Mathematics or Mathematics and Science. (2) English. (3) French, with German or Latin as subsidiary subjects. (4) Geography, with Latin or German as subsidiary subjects. (5) General Subjects. (6) Classics. (7) History. (8) English.
Hackney Secondary School for Girls, Cassland Road, N.E.	2	(2) Drill and Games.
St. Pancras Secondary School for Girls, Crowndale Road, N.W. ...	3	(1) Science Mistress to take Geography and Botany and General Elementary Science. (2) Mathematics, with English as subsidiary subject. (3) Junior form mistress, who should be able to take English and Elementary French on the direct method.
Wandsworth Secondary School for Girls, Mayfield Road, West Hill, Wandsworth	1	Geography.
Chelsea Secondary School for Girls, Hortensia Road, Chelsea	The number of vacancies and subjects has not yet been fixed.

SALARIES.

Assistant Masters.—The commencing salary of Assistant Masters appointed to the Council's Secondary Schools is £150 a-year, rising by annual increments of £10, subject to satisfactory service, to £300 a year.

In cases where Masters are placed in positions of special responsibility the Council may allow them to proceed to a higher maximum of £350 a-year, by annual increments of £10.

Assistant Mistresses.—The commencing salary of Assistant Mistresses appointed to the Council's Secondary Schools is £120 a-year, rising by annual increments of £10, subject to satisfactory service, to £220 a-year.

In cases where Mistresses are placed in positions of special responsibility, the Council may allow them to proceed to a higher maximum of £250 a-year, by annual increments of £10.

The salary attaching to the post of Drill Mistress is a fixed one of £130 a-year.

Commencing salaries higher than the minimum stated above for Assistant Masters and Mistresses are allowed to those with satisfactory experience, and in this connection two years' satisfactory service in a school approved by the Council for the purpose will be counted as the equivalent of one year spent in one of the Council's Schools, provided that (1) experience of less than two years in any one school shall not be reckoned, and (2) not more than ten years' outside service in all shall be taken into account.

Applications should be made on Form T.S. 56, to be obtained, together with particulars of the appointment, from the Clerk of the Council, Education Offices, Victoria Embankment, W.C., to whom they must be returned not later than 11 a.m. on April 18th, 1908, accompanied by copies of three testimonials of recent date.

All communications on the subject must be endorsed "Teacher in Secondary Schools"; a stamped addressed envelope must be enclosed.

Canvassing, either directly or indirectly, will be held to be a disqualification for employment.

Full particulars of appointments in the Council's service are given in the "London County Council Gazette," which is published weekly, and can be obtained from the Council's publishers, Messrs. P. S. King & Son, 2 and 4, Great Smith Street, Westminster, S.W., price (including postage) 1½d. an issue, or, for the year, a prepaid subscription of 6s. 6d.

G. L. GOMME,
Clerk of the London County Council.

Education Offices,
Victoria Embankment, W.C.
March 25th, 1908.

EDUCATIONAL.

BOOTHAM SCHOOL, YORK.

(Under the Management of the Society of Friends.)

Twenty-six boys passed University Entrance Examinations in 1906 and 1907.

A new feature for post-Matriculation students is a CITIZENSHIP COURSE, including Economics and Modern History with special reference to existing political institutions and social problems.

The School continues to hold a strong position in Leisure-Hour work:—Natural History, Archaeology, Carpentry, etc.

For copies of prospectus and full particulars with regard to scholarships, apply to the Head Master, Bootham School, York.

Head Master: Arthur Rowntree, Certificate of Distinction in the Theory, History, and Practice of Education, Cantab.

THE HINDHEAD SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Principal: Miss J. F. GRUNER, Certificated Student of Girton College, late Second Mistress, Dulwich High School, G.P.D.S.Co. Education thoroughly modern; physical training and outdoor games. Great attention is paid to healthful conditions of life. The boarding-house stands at an elevation of 800 ft.—For prospectus address to BRACKENHURST, HINDHEAD, HASLEMERE, R.S.O.

THE LEYS SCHOOL, CAMBRIDGE.

ENTRANCE SCHOLARSHIPS IN JULY.

Preparatory School at Hitchin recognised by the Governors. Enquiries should be addressed to the BURSAR.

INFORMATION AND ADVICE AS TO SCHOOLS.

THE SCHOLASTIC, CLERICAL, AND MEDICAL ASSOCIATION, LTD. (a body of Oxford and Cambridge graduates), gives advice and assistance without charge to Parents and Guardians in the selection of schools (for GIRLS AND BOYS) at home or abroad, and as to Tutors (ARMY, NAVY, UNIVERSITY, &c.). A statement of the requirements should be sent to the Manager.

R. J. BEEVOR, M.A., 22, Craven Street, Trafalgar Square, W.C.

Telegrams: "TRIFORM, LONDON." Telephone No. 1864 GERRARD

DALTON HALL OF RESIDENCE

UNIVERSITY OF MANCHESTER.

Affiliated to the University. Contains Study Bedrooms for Fifty Students, with Dining Hall, Library, Class Room, Common Room, Billiard Room, Workshop, Fives and Tennis Courts, Football Field and Garden. Stands on three and a-half acres in a residential Park. Large staff of Tutors, and all social and athletic advantages of college life. Managed on undenominational lines by the Society of Friends.

JOHN W. GRAHAM, M.A., Principal.

LEIGHTON PARK SCHOOL (Near Reading).

Under the Management of the Society of Friends.

Boys from this PUBLIC SCHOOL have done well at the Universities and in business careers.

The School stands in its own grounds of about 45 acres, high above the town and the Thames Valley.

For Honours List, Prospectus, particulars of Scholarships, and other information, apply to the Head Master, JOHN RIDGES, M.A., at the School.

SEASIDE SCHOOLS FOR GIRLS.

BROADWATER HALL, WORTHING.

Good English Education. Eight Acres of Grounds.

LE PLEIN AIR, DIEPPE.

Languages, Accomplishments, Needlework, Cookery.

Principals—THE MISSES TRITTON.

AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE, TAMWORTH.

YOUTHS TRAINED FOR HOME OR COLONIES.

Farm, 1,000 acres. Carpentry, Smith's work. Riding and Shooting taught. Prospectus.

WILLASTON SCHOOL, NANTWICH.

The next Entrance Examination will be held at the SCHOOL ON MARCH 31st.

For particulars of admission on the Foundation, apply to the Head Master.

MALVERN COLLEGE.

Scholarship Examination, June 2nd, 3rd & 4th.

One of £87, five or more of £50, five or more of £30 (£21 for Day Scholars) per annum. Faber Exhibition of £12 awarded to boy who does best in examination. Council nominations, value £12 per annum, may be awarded to boys who do well, but fail to obtain a scholarship. For particulars, apply to the Head Master or Secretary.

Economy

PEARS is the most economical of all soaps. It wears to the thinness of a sixpence. Moisten the thin remainder of your old cake and place it in the hollow of the new one where it will adhere, thus you will not lose an atom, and will see that PEAR'S' IS NOT ONLY PURE, BUT ECONOMICAL.

The Nation

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 12, 1907.

A SELECTION FROM MACMILLAN'S NEW & FORTHCOMING BOOKS.

THE MAN-EATERS OF TSAVO, And other East African Adventures.

By Lieut.-Colonel J. H. PATTERSON, D.S.O. With numerous Illustrations, and a Foreword by FREDERICK COURTENEY SELOUS. 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.
This record of hairbreadth adventures among big game is certainly one of the most exciting that has ever appeared in print.

F. C. SELOUS. AFRICAN NATURE NOTES AND REMINISCENCES.

By F. C. SELOUS. Author of "A Hunter's Wanderings in Africa." With a Foreword by PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT, and Illustrations by E. CALDWELL. 8vo.

H. FIELDING HALL. THE SOUL OF THE WORLD.

By H. FIELDING HALL, Author of "The Soul of a People," "A People at School," &c. 8vo.

THE BRUSHWOOD BOY.

By RUDYARD KIPLING. With Illustrations in Colour by F. H. TOWNSEND. 8vo, 6s. [Ready.]

GRANFORD SERIES.—New Volume. SILAS MARNER.

By GEORGE ELIOT. With Illustrations in Colour and Black-and-White by HUGH THOMSON. Crown 8vo, cloth extra, with gilt edges, 6s.

FREDERIC HARRISON. THE PHILOSOPHY OF COMMON SENSE.

By FREDERIC HARRISON. Extra Crown 8vo, 7s. 6d. net. [October 30.]

THE SANTUARIO OF THE MADONNA DI VICO, PANTHEON OF CHARLES EMANUEL I. OF SAVOY.

By L. MELANO ROSSI. With Frontispiece in Colour, numerous Photogravure Plates, and other Illustrations. Super-Royal 8vo, 2ls. net. [Ready.]

LIFE IN THE HOMERIC AGE.

By THOMAS DAY SEYMOUR, Hillhouse Professor of the Greek Language and Literature in Yale University. Illustrated, 8vo, 17s. net. [Ready.]

The Author of "PRO CHRISTO ET ECCLESIA." CHRISTUS FUTURUS

By the Author of "Pro Christo et Ecclesia." Crown 8vo, 5s. net. [Ready.]

THE EMPIRE OF CHRIST.

Being a Study of the Missionary Enterprise in the Light of Modern Religious Thought. By BERNARD LUCAS, Author of "The Faith of a Christian," "The Fifth Gospel," &c. Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. net. [Ready.]

ENGLAND AND GERMANY.

By AUSTIN HARRISON. Crown 8vo.

SIXTY YEARS OF PROTECTION IN CANADA (1846-1907).

"Where Industry Leans on the Politician." By EDWARD PORRITT. Crown 8vo.

LORD ACTON. THE HISTORY OF FREEDOM, AND OTHER ESSAYS.

Edited, with an Introduction, by JOHN NEVILLE FIGGIS, M.A., and REGINALD VERE LAURENCE, M.A. 8vo, 10s. net.

HISTORICAL ESSAYS AND STUDIES.

Edited, with an Introduction, by JOHN NEVILLE FIGGIS, M.A., and REGINALD VERE LAURENCE, M.A. 8vo, 10s. net.

MRS. J. R. GREEN. STUDIES IN IRISH HISTORY.

By ALICE STOPFORD GREEN. Extra Crown 8vo.

LADY DOROTHY NEVILL. LEAVES FROM THE NOTE-BOOKS OF LADY DOROTHY NEVILL.

Edited by her Son, RALPH NEVILL. With Photogravure Portraits, 8vo, 15s. net.

WILLIAM ALLINGHAM: a Diary.

Edited by H. ALLINGHAM and D. RADFORD. With Portraits in Photogravure, 8vo. 12s. net. [October 18.]

OLD SPANISH MASTERS.

Engraved by TIMOTHY COLE. With historical notes by CHARLES H. CAFFIN and comments by the Engraver.
1. Ordinary Edition. Imperial 8vo. 30s. net. [October 18]
2. Edition de Luxe. Limited to Forty copies. With the text printed on hand-made paper, and the plates printed on Japanese paper at hand press. Ten guineas net.

POEMS OLD AND NEW.

By MARGARET L. WOODS, Author of "A Village Tragedy," &c. Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net. [Ready.]
Daily Telegraph.—"Packed from cover to cover with the essence of poetry."

THE GLOBE LIBRARY.—New Volumes. THE DIARY OF JOHN EVELYN, 1620-1706

With an Introduction and Notes by AUSTIN DOBSON, Hon. LL.D. Edin. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

THE POETICAL WORKS OF JOHN KEATS.

A Re-Issue of the Edition Edited, with Introduction and Notes, by WILLIAM T. ARNOLD. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

GOLDEN TREASURY SERIES.—New Volumes. APHORISMS & REFLECTIONS from the WORKS OF THOMAS HENRY HUXLEY.

Selected by HENRIETTA A. HUXLEY. Pott 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

LYRICAL POEMS OF T. E. BROWN.

Selected by H. F. BROWN and H. G. DAKYNS. Pott 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

NEW 6s. NOVELS. ARETHUSA. By F. MARION CRAWFORD. Illus- trated by GERTRUDE DEMAIN HAMMOND. [Ready.] THE STOOPING LADY. By MAURICE HEWLETT. [Ready.] THE ANGEL OF FORGIVENESS. By ROSA NOUCHETTE CAREY. [Ready.]

MRS. MOLESWORTH. THE LITTLE GUEST.

A Story for Children. By Mrs. MOLESWORTH. Illustrated by GERTRUDE DEMAIN HAMMOND. Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. [Ready.]

Macmillan's List of Autumn Announcements post free on application to "X" Department.

MACMILLAN & CO., Ltd., St. Martin's Street, London, W.C.

Archibald's Constable's Autumn Announcements 1907.

THE OLD PEABODY PEW

BY

KATE DOUGLAS WIGGIN.

Illustrated by

ALICE BARBER STEPHENS.

Crown 8vo. Cloth gilt. 3s. 6d. net.

6s. NOVELS.

The Younger Set, by Robert W. Chambers, author of "The Fighting Chance." With 8 Illustrations by G. C. Wilms-hurst.

The Measure of the Rule, by Robert Barr, author of "The Mutable Many," "In the Midst of Alarms," &c.

In the Shade of the Cloister, by Arnold Wright.

The Thornton Device, by the Hon. Mrs. Grosvenor, author of "The Bands of Orion."

Valerie Upton, by Anne Douglas Sedgwick, author of "The Shadow of Life," &c.

William Jordan Junior, by J. C. Snaith, author of "Broke of Covenen."

The Square Peg, by W. E. Norris, author of "Lord Leonard the Luckless," &c.

The Helpmate, by May Sinclair, author of "The Divine Fire," &c. 3rd Impression.

Marcus Hay, by Stanley Portal Hyatt. The Pull Mall Gazette says: "A new writer, claiming and deserving a hearty welcome."

A Walking Gentleman, by James Prior, author of "Forest Folk," "Hyslop," 2nd Impression.

The Tribune says: "A book that is full of Nature, fresh air, and knowledge of human character."

Nicolete. A Novel. By Evelyn Sharp. 2nd Impression.

The Tribune says: "A thoroughly sympathetic and living story."

Nimrod's Wife, by Mrs. E. Thompson Seton, author of "A Woman Tenderfoot." With numerous Illustrations. Large Crown 8vo. 6s.

The Comments of Bagshot, by J. A. Spender, Editor of the Westminster Gazette. Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d. net.

The France of To-Day, by Barrett Wendell, Professor of English at Harvard College. 6s. net.

The Story of a Beautiful Duchess, By Horace Blackley, M.A. Being an Account of the Life and Times of Elizabeth Gunning, Duchess of Hamilton and Argyll. With 8 Photogravure Portraits and Illustrations. Demy 8vo. Price 21s. net.

The Ghosts of Piccadilly, by G. S. Street. Demy 8vo. With 12 Photogravure Plates. 10s. 6d. net.

London Parks and Gardens, by The Hon. Mrs. Evelyn Cecil, with numerous Illustrations in Colour by Lady Victoria Manners. Imp. 8vo. Price, 21s. net.

Ice-Bound Heights of the Mustangh, by Fanny Bullock Workman and William Hunter Workman, M.A., M.E., with a Map and about 170 Illustrations, several of which are in Colours. Demy 8vo. 21s. net.

The Pulse of Asia, a Journey in Central Asia illustrating the Geographical Basis of History. By Elsworth Huntingdon. Fully illustrated. Demy 8vo. 14s. net.

Greece and the Aegean Islands, by Philip Sanford Marden, fully illustrated. Crown 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

William Blake, the Poet, the Artist, the Man, with some contemporary accounts, by Arthur Symonds. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

Index of Archaeological Papers, 1665-1890, compiled by G. Laurence Gomme, F.S.A., Royal 8vo, 25s. net.

Marlowe, a Drama in five acts, by Josephine Preston Peabody, Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net.

By the same Author—

The Singing Leaves. 16 mo. Cloth gilt. 4s. net. [3rd Impression.]

More Pages from the Day-Book of Bethia Hardacre, by Ella Fuller Maitland, author of "The Day Book of Bethia Hardacre." Post 8vo. 6s.

Leading American Soldiers, by R. M. Johnston, M.A. Cantab. With 13 Portraits. Extra Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d. net. Washington, Greene, Taylor, Scott, Andrew Jackson, Grant, Sherman, Sheridan, McClellan, Meade, Lee, "Stonewall Jackson," Joseph E. Johnston.

Soldiers of Fortune, in Camp and Court, by Alexander Innes Shand, author of "Days of the Past," &c. Demy 8vo. 10s. 6d. net.

Human Bullets, a Soldier's story of Port Arthur, by Tadayoshi Sakurai, Lieutenant, I.J.A., with an introduction by Count Okuma. Crown 8vo, 6s. net.

My School and My Gospel, by Sir Hubert Von Herkomer, C.V.O., R.A., With 3 Coloured and 4 Photogravure Plates, together with numerous Half-tone Illustrations. Imperial 8vo.

Portuguese Architecture, by W. Crum Watson, Super Royal 8vo, Fully Illustrated.

A Theory of Pure Design, Harmony, Balance, Rhythm, by Denman W. Ross, Ph.D. Lecturer on the Theory of Design in Harvard University. Fcap 4to. With Illustrations and Diagrams. 10s. 6d. net.

Burial Customs of Ancient Egypt, by John Garstang, B.A., F.S.A., author of "Tombs of the Third Egyptian Dynasty." Crown 4to. 31s. 6d. net.

The Tomb of Iouiya and Tuiyou (The Theodore Davis' Explorations). Royal Quarto. Price, £2 2s. net.

Humphrey, Duke of Gloucester, by Kenneth Vickers, with numerous illustrations. Portrait and Reproductions of MS. Demy 8vo. 15s. net.

Dyott's Diary, 1781-1845, Edited by Reginald W. Jeffery, M.A., Brasenose College With Portraits. In Two Volumes. Demy 8vo. 31s. 6d. net.

Air Ships Past and Present, by Hauptmann Hildebrandt, translated by W. H. Story. Fully Illustrated. Royal 8vo. 10s. 6d. net.

The Cause and Extent of the Recent Industrial Progress of Germany, by Earl Dean Howard, Ph.D., Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net.

The Forest Playfellow, by E. K. Sanders, Photogravure Frontispiece. Fcap 8vo. Gilt Cloth. 3s. 6d. net.

The Types of English Literature Series.—I. The Popular Ballad, by Francis B. Gummere, Professor of English in Haverford College. Crown 8vo. 6s. net. II. The Literature of Roguery, by Frank Wadweh Chandler, Professor of English and History; Brooklyn Polytechnic. 2 vols. Crown 8vo, 12s. net.

The Nature Poems of George Meredith, with 16 full page Photogravures, by William Hyde, New Edition. Royal 8vo 12s. 6d. net.

The Hanging of the Crane, by Henry W. Longfellow, illustrated by Arthur I. Keller. Tall Crown 8vo, limited to 1,000 numbered copies. 21s. net. Centennial Edition.

Lonnfellow, by Charles Eliot Norton Fcap 8vo. With 2 Illustrations. 3s. 6d. net.

The Claims of French Poetry, Nine Studies in the Greater French Poets, by John C. Bailey, author of "Studies in Some Famous Letters," and Editor of the Poems of William Cowper. Demy 8vo. Cloth Gilt. 7s. 6d. net.

A Treasury of English Literature, Selected and arranged by Kate M. Warren, Demy 8vo. About 1,000 pp. 7s. 6d. net, also in six parts, cloth, 1s. net each.

The Arthur of the English Poets, by Dr. Howard Maynadier, Crown 8vo, 6s. net.

Some unpublished Correspondence of—David Garrick, Edited by George Pierce Baker, Professor of English in Harvard University. With Illustrations. 8vo. 31s. 6d. net.

The Divine Comedy of Dante Alighieri, Translated by Charles Eliot Norton. 3 Vols. Crown 8vo. 5s. net each. I. Hell. II. Purgatory. III. Paradise.

The Procedure of the House of Commons, a Study of its History and Present Form, by Joseph Redlich, Professor in the Faculty of Law and Political Science in the University of Vienna. Author of "Local Government in England." Translated from the German by A. Ernest Steinthal, of Lincoln's Inn, Barrister-at-Law, formerly Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge. With an Introduction and a Supplementary Chapter by Sir Courtenay Ilbert, K.C.S.I., Clerk to the House of Commons. Royal 8vo. 3 Volumes. 31s. 6d. net.

FARM MANAGEMENT, by F. W. CARD Professor of Agriculture. 66 Full-page Illustrations, and numerous useful Tables and Returns. Demy 8vo. Price 8s. 6d. net.

FARM ANIMALS—How to Breed, Feed, Care for and Use them, by E. V. WILCOX, Ph.D., M.A. (U.S.A. Department of Agriculture). With upwards of 60 Full-page Illustrations. Demy 8vo. Price 8s. 6d. net.

SOILS—How to Handle and Improve Them, by S. W. FLETCHER. With more than 100 Illustrations. Demy 8vo. Price 8s. 6d. net.

FRUIT RECIPES—A Manual of the Food Values of Fruits and Nine Hundred Different Ways of Using them, by RILEY M. FLETCHER BERRY. Illustrated from Photographs. Large Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.

BOOKS FOR CHILDREN.

The Fairy Tales of

HANS CHRISTIAN ANDERSEN

With upwards of 180 Illustrations, by HELEN STRATTON. Coloured Cover and Frontispiece. Uniform with "Grimms' Fairy Tales." Large square 8vo. 3s. 6d. net.

SONGS FOR LITTLE PEOPLE, by NORMAN GALE. Illustrated by Helen Stratton. A New Edition. Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d.

DICK'S ANGEL, by Mrs. EDWIN HOHLER, author of "Peter," &c. With 9 Full-page Illustrations. Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d.

FAIRY TALES OF THE BROTHERS GRIMM. Translated by Mrs. EDGAR LUCAS. Illustrated with 100 Drawings by Arthur Rackham, with Frontispiece, Title Page, and Cover Design lithographed in Colours. New Edition. Large square 8vo. 3s. 6d. net.

THE JAPANESE FAIRY BOOK, by YEI THEODORA OZAKI. With Native Illustrations. New Edition. Square Demy 8vo. 3s. 6d. net.

NEW EDITIONS & REPRINTS.

GREAT ENGLISHMEN OF THE 16TH CENTURY, by SIDNEY LEE. New Edition. Illustrated with Portraits. Ex. Cr. 8vo. 5s. net.

THE KINGDOM OF THE YELLOW ROBE, By ERNEST YOUNG, B.Sc. New Edition. With illustrations. Demy 8vo. 5s. net.

ALEXANDER HAMILTON, by FREDERICK SCOTT OLIVER. New Edition. With a Frontispiece. Demy 8vo. 6s. net.

LEAVES FROM THE GOLDEN LEGEND. Chosen by H. D. MADGE, LL.M. With Illustrations by C. M. Watts. New Edition, 16mo. Gilt top. 3s. 6d. net.

LONDON CITY CHURCHES, by A. E. DANIELL. With numerous Illustrations. Cloth gilt. 3s. 6d. net. Studies in the Lives of the Saints, by EDWARD HUTTON. Fcap 8vo. 3s. 6d. net.

PLEASE WRITE FOR NEW LIST AND CATALOGUE TO

A. CONSTABLE & Co, Limited, 10, Orange Street, London, W.C.

The Nation

The Pick of the Publishing Season.

The following is a selection of the more interesting Books appearing in the Publishers' Autumn Lists, grouped under different subject headings.

ART.

- The Peter Pan Picture Book. The Story of Peter Pan, retold by Daniel O'Connor, from the play by J. M. Barrie. Illustrations by Alice B. Woodward. (Bell. 5s. net.)
- Charles Turner, Engraver. By Alfred Whitman. (Bell. 31s. 6d. net.)
- George Morland. By G. C. Williamson. (Bell. 7s. 6d. net.)
- Art and the Camera. By Antony Guest. (Bell. 6s. net.)
- Manx Crosses. By P. M. C. Kermode. (Bemrose.)
- Old English Gold Plate. By E. A. Jones. (Bemrose.)
- George Morland. By Sir Walter Gilbey, Bart. (Black. 20s. net.)
- Suppressed Plates. By G. S. Layard. (Black. 10s. 6d. net.)
- John Hassall, R.I. Text by A. E. Johnson. (Black. 3s. 6d. net.)
- Frank Reynolds, R.I. Text by A. E. Johnson. (Black. 3s. 6d. net.)
- The Royal Navy. Painted by N. Wilkinson. Text by H. L. Swinburne. (Black. 20s. net.)
- A History and Description of Italian Majolica. By M. L. Solon. (Cassell. 42s. net.)
- The Medici Series of Coloured Reproductions after the Old Masters. Filippino Lippi: 1457 (?) - 1504. (15s. net.)
- Alessandro Filipepi, called Botticelli. (25s. net.) (Chatto & Windus.)
- Artists of the Italian Renaissance. Collected and arranged by E. L. Seeley. (Chatto & Windus. 7s. 6d. net.)
- Women of Florence. Translated from Original Italian Work: La Donna Fiorentina Del Buon Tempo Antico. By Mary G. Steegmann. (Chatto & Windus. 7s. 6d. net.)
- The Old Silver Sacramental Vessels of Foreign Protestant Churches in England. By E. Alfred Jones. (Dent.)
- The Ingoldsby Legends. With about 100 illustrations (24 in colours and 12 on tinted backgrounds). By Arthur Rackham, A.R.W.S. (Dent. Buckram, 15s. net.)
- Vasari on Technique. Translated by L. S. MacLehose. Revised, with introduction by Professor Baldwin Brown. (Dent. 15s. net.)
- The Art Collections of Europe. A series of illustrated Guides to the Great Picture Galleries of the Continent. (Dent. 3s. 6d. net each.)
- Eugène Delacroix. By Dorothy Bussy. With 26 illustrations. (Duckworth. 5s. net.)
- The Rendering of Nature in Early Greek Art. By Emanuel Lowy, Professor in University of Rome. Translated by John Fothergill. With 30 illustrations. (Duckworth. 5s. net.)
- The Christ Face in Art. By the Rev. J. Burns. With 60 illustrations in tint. (Duckworth. 6s. net.)
- The Library of Art. New vols.:
- Rembrandt. By Professor Baldwin Brown, of Edinburgh University. With 46 illustrations. (Duckworth. 7s. 6d. net.)
 - William Blake. By Basil de Selincourt, Author of "Giotto." With 50 illustrations. (Duckworth. 7s. 6d. net.)
 - Roman Sculpture from Augustus to Constantine. By Mrs. Arthur Strong, LL.D. With 130 plates. (Duckworth. 10s. net.)
- A History of Sculpture. By Ernest H. Short. In 1 vol. With over 100 illustrations. (Heinemann.)
- Below the Cataracts. By Walter Tyndale. With 60 plates in colour reproduced from water-colour drawings by the author. In 1 vol. (Heinemann.)
- Cathedral Cities of France. By Herbert Marshall, R.W.S., and Hester Marshall. With 60 coloured plates by Herbert Marshall, R.W.S. (Heinemann.)
- Alice's Adventures in Wonderland. By Lewis Carroll. An

- illustrated edition with 18 plates in colour and numerous black-and-white illustrations by Arthur Rackham, and an Introductory Poem by Austin Dobson. (Heinemann.)
- Stories from the Arabian Nights. Illustrated by Edmund Dulac. The stories retold by Laurence Housman. (Hodder & Stoughton. 15s. net. Edition de Luxe, £2 2s. net.)
- Decorative Styles and Periods. By Helen C. Candee. (Hodder & Stoughton. 8s. 6d. net.)
- Hubert and John Van Eyck, their Life and Work. By W. H. James Weale. (John Lane. 105s. net.)
- The Cathedrals and Churches of Northern Italy. By T. F. Bumpus. (Laurie. 16s. net.)
- London Churches, Ancient and Modern. By T. F. Bumpus. (Laurie. 6s. net each.)
- Studies in Pictures. An Introduction to the famous Galleries. By J. C. Van Dyke. (Laurie. 6s. net.)
- The Santuario of the Madonna Di Vico, Pantheon of Charles Emanuel I. of Savoy. By L. Melano Rossi. (Macmillan. 21s. net.)
- Old Spanish Masters. Engraved by T. Cole. (Macmillan. 30s. net.)
- Goldsmiths' and Silversmiths' Work. By N. Dawson. (Methuen. 25s. net.)
- A History of Seals. By W. de G. Birch. (Methuen. 25s. net.)
- Early Wood-cut Initials. By O. Jennings. (Methuen. 21s. net.)
- A Book of Caricatures. By Max Beerbohm. (Methuen. 15s. net.)
- Church Furniture. By J. C. Cox and A. Harvey. (Methuen. 7s. 6d. net.)
- Honoré Daumier. By E. L. Cary. (Putnams.)
- The Northern Italian Painters of the Renaissance. By B. Berenson. (Putnams.)
- Scenes in the Life of Our Lord. Pictures by Harold Copping, described by the Lord Bishop of Durham. (Religious Tract Society. 16s. net.)
- Fifty Years of Modern Painting: Corot to Sargent. By J. E. Plythian. Illustrated in colour and in black and white. (Grant Richards.)
- Burne-Jones. By J. E. Plythian. (Grant Richards.)
- Auguste Rodin. By F. Lawton. (Grant Richards.)
- English Society of the Eighteenth Century in Contemporary Art. By R. Davies, F.S.A. (Seeley. Sewed, 5s. net.)
- Josiah Wedgwood. By A. H. Church, F.R.S. (Seeley. Cloth, 2s. net.)
- Don Quixote. By Miguel de Cervantes. With 260 drawings by Daniel Vierge. 4 vols. (Unwin. £15 net.)
- Towers and Spires: Their Design and Arrangement. By Professor Tyrrell Green. (Wells, Gardner.)
- Universal Dictionary of Artists. Edited by Dr. U. Thieme and Dr. F. Becker. The text written in German. Will be completed in 20 large 8vo. vols. Vol. I. will be issued shortly. Vol. 2 in the press. (Williams and Norgate.)

BIOGRAPHY AND MEMOIRS.

- The Letters of S. Reynolds Hole, Dean of Rochester. Edited with Memoir by George A. B. Dewar. (Allen. 15s. net.)
- Memoirs of Mistral. Rendered into English by C. Maud. (Arnold. 12s. 6d. net.)
- The Mystery of Maria Stella, Lady Newborough. (Arnold. 7s. 6d. net.)
- Letters of Dr. John Brown. With letters from Ruskin, Thackeray, and others. Edited by his son and D. W. Forest. (Black. 10s. 6d. net.)
- G. A. Henty: The Story of an Active Life. By G. Manville Fenn. (Blackie. 7s. 6d. net.)
- The Life and Letters of Sir Richard C. Jebb. By his Wife,

- Caroline Jebb. With a Chapter on Sir Richard Jebb as Scholar and Critic by Dr. A. W. Verrall. (Cambridge University Press.)
- The Life of Sterndale Bennett. By his son, J. Sterndale Bennett. (Cambridge University Press.)
- The Life of Gilbert Burnet. By T. E. S. Clarke, B.D., and H. C. Foxcroft, with an Introduction by C. H. Firth, M.A., Regius Professor of Modern History in the University of Oxford. (Cambridge University Press.)
- Melba: An Authorised Biography. By E. Tracey. (Chatto & Windus.)
- Marie de Médicis and the Court of France in the Eighteenth Century. Translated from the French of M. L. Batiffol by Mary King, under the superintendence of H. W. C. Davis. (Chatto & Windus. 7s. 6d. net.)
- Life and Letters of Sir Henry Wotton. By L. P. Smith. 2 vols. (Clarendon Press.)
- William Blake—the Poet, the Artist, the Man. By Arthur Symons. (Constable. 10s. 6d. net.)
- The Story of a Beautiful Duchess. Being an Account of the Life and Times of Elizabeth Gunning, Duchess of Hamilton and Argyll. By Horace Bleackley. (Constable. 2fs. net.)
- Dyotts' Diary, 1781-1845. Edited by R. W. Jeffery. (Constable. 3fs. 6d. net.)
- Letters from the Raven. Being the Correspondence of Lafcadio Hearn with Henry Walkin. (Constable. 5s. net.)
- Some Unpublished Correspondence of David Garrick. Edited by G. P. Baker. (Constable. 3fs. 6d. net.)
- James Francis Edward: The Old Chevalier. By M. Haile. (Dent. 16s. net.)
- St. Catherine of Siena: A Study in Italian History of the Fourteenth Century. By E. G. Gardner, M.A. With an appendix containing some hitherto unpublished Letters of St. Catherine, and illustrations reproduced in photogravure. (Dent. 16s. net.)
- Sir George Grey. By G. C. Henderson, M.A. (Dent. 12s. 6d. net.)
- The Temple Biographies. Edited by Rev. Dugald Macfadyen, M.A. New volume—Abraham Lincoln. By H. B. Binns. (Dent. 4s. 6d. net.)
- The Life of James McNeill Whistler. By E. R. and J. Pennell. In 2 vols. With many illustrations. Authorised by Mr. Whistler. (Heinemann.)
- My Double Life. Memoirs of Sarah Bernhardt. In 1 vol. With many illustrations in colour and black and white. (Heinemann.)
- William Pitt, Earl of Chatham. By A. von Ruville. With introduction by Professor H. E. Egerton. In 3 vols. (Heinemann.)
- Memoirs of the Comtesse de Boigne. Vol. II.—1815—1819. Edited from the original manuscript by Charles Nicoulaud. With portrait and facsimiles. Vol. III. is in preparation. (Heinemann.)
- The Brontës: Life and Letters. By Clement K. Shorter. 2 vols. (Hodder & Stoughton. 24s. net.)
- Thomas Alva Edison: Sixty Years of an Inventor's Life. By F. A. Jones. (Hodder & Stoughton. 6s.)
- George Matheson, D.D., LL.D., F.R.S.E. By the Rev. D. Macmillan, D.D. (Hodder & Stoughton. 7s. 6d.)
- The Life of Thomas J. Barnardo. (Hodder & Stoughton. 12s.)
- Passages from the Past. By his Grace the Duke of Argyll. In 2 vols. (Hutchinson. 24s. net.)
- The House of Howard. By the late G. Brennan and E. P. Statham. In 2 vols. (Hutchinson. 24s. net.)
- A Princess of Intrigue: Madame de Longueville and Her Times. By H. N. Williams. In 2 vols. (Hutchinson. 24s. net.)
- Lord Craven and the Queen of Hearts. By N. Connell. In 2 vols. (Hutchinson. 24s. net.)
- George III. as Monarch, Man, and Statesman. By B. Willson. (Jack. 10s. 6d. net.)
- Coke, of Norfolk, and his Friends. By A. M. W. Stirling. In 2 vols. (John Lane. 32s. net.)
- The True Story of my Life. By Alice M. Diehl. (John Lane. 10s. 6d. net.)
- The Heart of Gambetta. Translated from the French of Francis Laur by Violette Montagu. (Lane. 7s. 6d. net.)
- Innocent the Great. By C. H. C. Pirie-Gordon. (Longmans. 9s. net.)
- Marshal Turenne. By the Author of "A Life of Sir Kenelm Digby." (Longmans.)
- The Life of Edward Henry Bickersteth, D.D. By Francis K. Aglionby. (Longmans. 6s. 6d. net.)
- Leaves from the Journals of Sir George Smart. Edited by H. B. Cox and C. L. E. Cox. (Longmans. 10s. 6d. net.)
- The Autobiography of Elizabeth M. Sewell. (Longmans.)
- The Lover of Queen Elizabeth, being the Story of the Life of Robert Dudley, Earl of Leicester. By Mrs. Aubrey Richardson. (Laurie. 12s. 6d. net.)
- Leaves from the Note-Books of Lady Dorothy Neville. Edited by her Son, Ralph Nevill. (Macmillan. 15s. net.)
- William Allingham: a Diary. Edited by H. Allingham and D. Radford. (Macmillan.)
- Reminiscences of Sir Henry Drummond Wolff. In 2 vols. (Macmillan.)
- The Life of Napoleon Bonaparte. By S. Baring-Gould. (Methuen. 10s. 6d. net.)
- My Memoirs. By Alexandre Dumas. Translated by E. M. Waller. In 6 vols. (Methuen. 6s. each.)
- An Artist's Reminiscences. By Walter Crane. (Methuen. 18s. net.)
- A Swan and her Friends. By E. V. Lucas. (Methuen. 12s. 6d. net.)
- The Queen of Letter Writers. By Janet Aldis. (Methuen. 12s. 6d. net.)
- Wordsworth and his Circle. By D. W. Rannie. (Methuen. 12s. 6d. net.)
- A Princess of the Old World. By E. C. Price. (Methuen. 12s. 6d. net.)
- The Letters of Queen Victoria. A Selection from Her Majesty's Correspondence, 1837-1861. Edited by A. C. Benson and Viscount Esher. 3 vols. (Murray. £3 3s. net.)
- The Letters of Robert Schumann, Musician and Composer, 1810-1856. Translated from German of Dr. C. Storck by Miss H. Bryant. (Murray. 9s. net.)
- The Life and Correspondence of George, First Earl Macartney, 1737-1806, first British Ambassador to China, &c. From hitherto unpublished correspondence and documents. By Mrs. H. H. Robins. (Murray.)
- Life and Work of William Penn, Quaker and Courtier, the Founder of Pennsylvania. By Mrs. C. Grant. (Murray.)
- The Reminiscences of the late Albert Pell, sometime M.P. for South Leicestershire. Edited, with a memoir, by T. Mackay. (Murray.)
- Fourteen Years in Parliament. By A. S. T. Griffith-Boscawen, late M.P. for the Tonbridge Division of Kent. (Murray.)
- A Soldier of the Legion. An Englishman's Adventures under the French Flag in Algeria and Tonquin. By G. Manington. Edited by W. C. Slater and A. J. Sarl. (Murray.)
- Annals of an Eton House. By Major G. Parry. (Murray.)
- George Sand and Her Lovers. By F. Gribble. (Nash. 15s. net.)
- Charles the Bold, Duke of Burgundy, 1433-1477. By Ruth Putnam. (Putnams. 5s.)
- William the Conqueror, and the Rule of the Normans. By F. M. Stenton. (Putnams. 5s.)
- The Life of Goethe. By Albert Bielschowsky. Translated by W. A. Cooper. 3 vols. (Putnams. 15s. net each.)
- Farmer George. By Lewis Melville. (Pitman. 24s. net.)
- A Great "Punch" Editor. Being the Life, Letters, and Diaries of Shirley Brooks. By George S. Layard. (Pitman. 18s. net.)
- Thomas Hood: His Life and Times. By Walter Jerrold. Illustrated. (Alston Rivers. 16s. net.)
- Henry Fielding: an Informal Memoir. By G. M. Godden. With numerous illustrations, hitherto unpublished letters, and other new matter. (Sampson, Low.)
- The Life of Lord Armstrong. By Lady Armstrong. (Smith, Elder.)
- The Biography of Lord Wantage. By Lady Wantage. (Smith, Elder.)
- Memoir of Sir Henry Norman. By Sir W. Lee-Warner. (Smith, Elder. 10s. 6d. net.)

- Cavour. By the Hon. Ed. Cadogan. (Smith, Elder. 7s. 6d. net.)
- King Edward VI.: an Appreciation attempted by Sir C. R. Markham. (Smith, Elder. 7s. 6d. net.)
- William Clarke, Journalist: His Life and Work. By H. Burrows and J. A. Hobson. (Swan Sonnenschein.)
- The Letters of Edward Lear. Edited by Lady Strachey. (Unwin. 15s. net.)
- Forty Years of Paris. By W. F. Lonergan. (Unwin. 10s. 6d. net.)
- A Sister of Marie Antoinette. By Mrs. Bearne. (Unwin. 10s. 6d. net.)
- Memorials of Thomas Davidson, the Wandering Scholar. Collected and Edited by W. Knight. (Unwin. 7s. 6d. net.)
- Michael Davitt: Revolutionary, Agitator, and Labour Leader. By F. Sheehy-Skeffington. (Unwin. 7s. 6d. net.)
- Sir Rowland Hill: the Story of a Great Reform. Told by his Daughter, Eleanor C. Smyth. (Unwin, 5s. net.)

CLASSICAL LITERATURE AND PHILOLOGY.

- A History of Classical Scholarship. From the end of the Middle Ages to the Present Day. In 2 vols. By J. E. Sandys. (Cambridge University Press.)
- A Book of Greek Verse. By W. Headlam, Litt.D. (Cambridge University Press.)
- The Third Edition of A. E. Haigh's Attic Theatre, revised and in part rewritten by A. W. Pickard-Cambridge. (Clarendon Press.)
- Cicero's Speeches against Verres. Edited by W. Peterson. (Clarendon Press.)
- Translation of Hesiod. By A. W. Mair. (Clarendon Press.)
- Aeschylus' Prometheus. Translated by R. Whitelaw. With Notes and Introductions by J. C. Collins. (Clarendon Press.)
- Aeschylus' Agamemnon. Translated by J. Conington. With Notes and Introductions by J. C. Collins. (Clarendon Press.)
- Herodotus. Books VII.-IX. With Introduction and Notes by R. W. Macan, M.A. 2 vols. (Macmillan.)
- Life in the Homeric Age. By T. D. Seymour. (Macmillan.)
- An Abridged Edition of Seyffert's Dictionary of Antiquities. (Swan Sonnenschein.)
- The Pandects (de verborum obligationibus) and the important parts of Gains. (Swan Sonnenschein.)
- Plato's Dialogues. By H. F. Carlill, M.A. (Swan Sonnenschein.)

CRITICISM AND BELLES LETTRES.

- Modern Studies. By O. Elton. (Arnold. 7s. 6d. net.)
- Queen Mary's Book. A Collection of Poems and Essays by Mary Queen of Scots. Edited by Mrs. S. Arbuthnot. (Bell.)
- Literary and Historical Essays. By H. G. Graham. (Black. 5s. net.)
- European Literature of the Later Nineteenth Century. By G. Saintsbury. (Blackwood. 5s. net.)
- The Cambridge History of English Literature. Vols. I. and II. (Cambridge University Press.)
- Essays and Addresses. By the late J. H. Bridges, M.B. With Introduction by F. Harrison. (Chapman & Hall. 12s. 6d. net.)
- The Literary Man's Bible. Edited and Arranged by W. L. Courtney. (Chapman & Hall. 10s. 6d. net.)
- The Rise of the Greek Epic. By Gilbert Murray. (Clarendon Press.)
- The Popular Ballad. By F. B. Gummere. (Constable. 5s. net.)
- A History of the Elizabethan Drama. By Felix E. Schelling. (Constable.)
- The Literature of Roguery. By F. W. Chandler. (Constable. 2 vols. 12s. net.)
- The Claims of French Poetry. By J. C. Bailey. (Constable. 7s. 6d. net.)
- Collected Essays. By Sir Leslie Stephen, K.C.B. With Introductory Essays by the Right Hon. James Bryce and Herbert Paul. Library Edition. In 10 vols. (Duckworth & Smith, Elder. The set, 60s. net.)

- Thoughts of Leonardo da Vinci as recorded in his Notebooks. Edited by Ed. McCurdy. (Duckworth.)
- Studies in Poetry. By the Rev. Stopford A. Brooke. (Duckworth.)
- Literatures of the World. Latin, by Marcus Dimsdale, M.A.; German, by Calvin Thomas, LL.D.; Hebrew, by Professor Phillipe Berger. (Heinemann. 6s. each.)
- Ibsen. By Edmund Gosse. (Hodder & Stoughton. 3s. 6d.)
- Immortal Memories. By Clement K. Shorter. (Hodder & Stoughton. 6s.)
- Oscar Wilde. By L. C. Ingleby. (Laurie. 12s. 6d. net.)
- Letters of Martin Luther. Translated by Margaret A. Currie. (Macmillan.)
- George Meredith: Novelist, Poet, Reformer. By May Sturge Henderson. (Methuen. 6s.)
- The Life-Work of Henrik Ibsen. By D. Merejkowski. Translated from Russian by G. A. Mounsey. (Moring.)
- The Life-Work of Montaigne. By D. Merejkowski. Translated by G. A. Mounsey. (Moring.)
- Saints and Wonders: According to the Old Writings and the Memory of the People of Ireland. By Lady Gregory. (Murray. 5s. net.)
- The Ibsen Secret. Key to the Prose Dramas of Henrik Ibsen. By Jennette Lee. (Putnams.)
- The Salon: A Study of French Society and Personalities of the 18th Century. By Helen Clergue. (Putnams. 12s. 6d. net.)
- A Pocketful of Sixpences: A Collection of Essays and Reminiscences. By G. W. E. Russell. (Grant Richards.)
- The Altar Fire. By A. C. Benson. (Smith, Elder. 7s. 6d. net.)
- Prose Idyls of the West Riding. By the Lady Catherine Milnes Gaskell. (Smith, Elder. 6s.)
- A Literary History of France. By Emile Faguet. (Fisher Unwin. 12s. 6d. net.)
- A Literary History of the Arabs. By R. A. Nicholson. (Fisher Unwin. 12s. 6d. net.)

DRAMA.

- The Struggle for a Free Stage in London. By W. Nicholson. (Constable. 10s. 6d. net.)
- A National Theatre. By William Archer and Granville Barker. (Duckworth. 5s. net.)
- The Breaking Point. A Censured Play. By Edward Garrett. (Duckworth. 3s. 6d. net.)
- The English Stage of To-day. By Dr. Mario Borsa. (Lane. 7s. 6d. net.)
- Wagnerian Romances. By G. Hall. (Lane. 5s. net.)
- Drama and Life. By A. B. Walkley. (Methuen. 6s.)
- Attila. A Tragedy in Four Acts. By Laurence Binyon. (Murray.)

FICTION.

- His First Leave. By L. Allen Harker. (Arnold. 6s.)
- The Desert Venture. By Frank Savile. (Arnold. 6s.)
- The Election of Isabel. By Ronald Macdonald. (Arnold. 6s.)
- The Man Who Was Thursday. By G. K. Chesterton. (Arrow-smith, Bristol. 6s.)
- A Close Ring. By Miss Betham Edwards. (Arrow-smith, Bristol. 6s.)
- Captain Dallington. By Mrs. Katherine S. Macquoid. (Arrow-smith, Bristol. 6s.)
- The Doings of Berengaria. By Shelland Bradley. (Bell. 6s.)
- The Story of an Alpine Winter. By Mrs. Aubrey Le Blond. (Bell. 6s.)
- The Power of the Keys. By Sydney C. Grier. (Blackwood. 6s.)
- The Moon of Bath. By Beth Ellis. (Blackwood. 6s.)
- A Subaltern of Horse. By the Author of "On the Heels of De Wet." (Blackwood. 6s.)
- Golden Morn. By H. A. Hinkson. (Cassell. 6s.)
- Kate Meredith. By C. J. Cutcliffe Hyne. (Cassell. 6s.)
- The Spinning of Fate. By Agnes C. Mitchell. (Cassell. 6s.)
- The Fashionable Christians. By Vincent Brown. (Chapman & Hall. 6s.)
- The Shadow of the Unseen. By Barry Pain and James Blyth. (Chapman & Hall. 6s.)
- Ashdod. By Agnes Farley. (Chapman & Hall. 6s.)

- Vanity. By Paul and Victor Margueritte. (Chatto & Windus. 6s.)
- The Windfall. By Charles E. Craddock. (Chatto & Windus. 6s.)
- The Inevitable Law. By F. E. Penny. (Chatto & Windus. 6s.)
- The Measure of the Rule. By Robert Barr. (Constable. 6s.)
- New Chronicles of Rebecca. By Robert W. Chambers. (Constable. 6s.)
- The Square Peg. By W. E. Norris. (Constable. 6s.)
- Partners of Providence. By Charles D. Stewart. (Duckworth. 6s.)
- Vronina. By Owen Vaughan. (Duckworth. 6s.)
- The Prodigal Nephew. By Judson Bolt. (Duckworth. 3s. 6d.)
- The Genteel A.B. By A. J. Dawson. (Grant Richards. 6s.)
- The Scoundrel. By Ernest Oldmeadow. (Grant Richards. 6s.)
- The Unpardonable Sin. By James Douglas. (Grant Richards. 6s.)
- A Romance of Three. By Edward Scott. (Greening. 6s.)
- The Abductors. By Joseph Prague. (Greening. 6s.)
- The Splendid Coward. By Houghton Townley. (Greening. 6s.)
- The Weavers. By Gilbert Parker. (Heinemann. 6s.)
- The Shuttle. By Mrs. Hodgson Burnett. (Heinemann. 6s.)
- Sheaves. By E. F. Benson. (Heinemann. 6s.)
- The Pulse of Life. By Mrs. Belloc Lowndes. (Heinemann. 6s.)
- The Explorer. By W. Somerset Maugham. (Heinemann. 6s.)
- Thou Fool. By J. J. Bell. (Hodder & Stoughton. 6s.)
- The Messenger. By Frankfort Moore. (Hodder & Stoughton. 6s.)
- The House of Lynch. By Leonard Merrick. (Hodder & Stoughton. 6s.)
- Quicksands. By J. A. Stuart. (Hodder & Stoughton. 6s.)
- All Moonshine. By Richard Whiteing. (Hurst & Blackett. 6s.)
- Across the Krishna. By Mrs. Croker. (Hurst & Blackett. 6s.)
- The Red Peril. By Coulson Kernahan. (Hurst & Blackett. 6s.)
- Fair Margaret. By H. Rider Haggard. (Hutchinson. 6s.)
- The Stumbling Block. By Justus Miles Forman. (Hutchinson. 6s.)
- The Marriage Lease. By F. Frankfort Moore. (Hutchinson. 6s.)
- Open Hatchways. By the Hon. Henry Coke. (Lane. 6s.)
- Painted Shadows. By Richard Le Gallienne. (Lane. 6s.)
- This Sorry Scheme. By Maude Annesley. (Lane. 6s.)
- The Goal. By May Wynne. (Digby Long. 6s.)
- Dollar City. By Lucas Cleeve. (Digby Long. 6s.)
- Arethusa. By F. Marion Crawford. (Macmillan. 6s.)
- The Fruit of the Tree. By Edith Wharton. (Macmillan. 6s.)
- The Stooping Lady. By Maurice Hewlett. (Macmillan. 6s.)
- The Halo. By Baroness von Hutten. (Methuen. 6s.)
- Votes for Women. By Elizabeth Robins. (Methuen. 6s.)
- Tales of Two People. By Anthony Hope. (Methuen. 6s.)
- Caroline. By Clementina Black. (Murray. 6s.)
- Toward the Dawn. By Halliwell Sutcliffe. (Murray. 6s.)
- A Nurse's Bequests. By Lilian Hamilton, M.D. (Murray. 6s.)
- The Spanish Prisoner. By Mrs. Philip Champion de Crespigny. (Nash. 6s.)
- Pigskin and Petticoat. By Helen Mathers. (Nash. 6s.)
- Julian Reval. By P. Laurence Oliphant. (Nash. 6s.)
- St. Jude's. By Ian Maclaren. (Religious Tract Society. 6s.)
- The Adventures of Count O'Connor. By Henry Stace. (Alston Rivers. 6s.)
- The Lord of Latimer Street. By Jane Wardle. (Alston Rivers. 6s.)
- Furze the Cruel. By John Trevena. (Alston Rivers. 6s.)
- Matthew Strong. By Mrs. Francis. (Sampson Low. 6s.)
- The Broken Road. By A. E. W. Mason. (Smith, Elder. 6s.)
- Laid up in Lavender. By Stanley Weyman. (Smith, Elder. 6s.)
- My Merry Rockhurst. By Agnes and Egerton Castle. (Smith, Elder. 6s.)
- A Lindsay o' the Dale. By A. G. Hales. (Fisher Unwin. 6s.)
- The Fool's Task. By Lucas Cleeve. (Fisher Unwin. 6s.)
- The Beetle. By Richard Marsh. (Fisher Unwin. 6s.)
- The Speculator. By Olive C. Malvery. (Werner Laurie. 6s.)
- The Alien. By Hélène Vacaresco. (Werner Laurie. 6s.)
- The Crowned Skull. By Fergus Hume. (Werner Laurie. 6s.)

HISTORY.

- The Growth of Modern Nations. From the French of H. de Tourville. (Arnold. 12s. 6d. net.)
- The Elizabethan Religious Settlement. By H. N. Birt. (Bell. 15s. net.)
- The Roman Journals of Ferdinand Gregorovius (1852—1874). (Bell. 10s. 6d. net.)
- Memorials of Old Norfolk. Edited by H. J. D. Astley. (Bemrose.)
- Memorials of Old Warwickshire. Edited by Alice Dryden. (Bemrose.)
- Memorials of Old London. 2 vols. Edited by P. H. Ditchfield. (Bemrose.)
- Some Dorset Manor Houses, with their Literary and Historical Associations. By Sidney Heath. (Bemrose.)
- A History of Scotland from the Roman Occupation. By Andrew Lang. In 4 vols. (Blackwood.)
- A History of the Royal and Ancient Golf Club, St. Andrews. By H. S. C. Everard. (Blackwood. 21s. net.)
- A Century of Political Development. By Hector Macpherson. (Blackwood. 6s. net.)
- The Russian Bastille. By T. P. Yonvatshev. Translated by Dr. A. S. Rappoport. (Chatto & Windus. 7s. 6d. net.)
- A History of Babylonia and Assyria. By L. W. King. 3 vols. (Chatto & Windus. 52s. 6d. net.)
- The Cambridge Modern History. Vol. V.: The Age of Louis XIV. (Cambridge University Press. 16s. net.)
- The Crusaders in the East. By W. B. Stevenson, M.A. (Cambridge University Press.)
- The Life of Alexander Severus. By R. V. Hind Hopkins. (Cambridge University Press.)
- Excerpta Cypria. A Collection of Materials for the History of Cyprus. By C. D. Cobham. (Cambridge University Press.)
- The Early Age of Greece. By William Ridgeway, M.A. Vol. II. (Cambridge University Press.)
- English Society in the Eleventh Century. By Paul Vinogradoff. (Clarendon Press.)
- Anglo-Chinese Commerce and Diplomacy. By A. J. Sargent. (Clarendon Press.)
- Court Minutes of the East India Company. Edited by W. Foster. (Clarendon Press.)
- History of the Peninsular War. Vol. III. By Professor Oman. (Clarendon Press.)
- Wiclif and the Lollards. By the Rev. J. C. Carrick, B.D. (T. & T. Clark.)
- The Old Venetian Palaces and Old Venetian Folk. By Thomas Okey. (Dent. 21s. net.)
- The Royal House of Stuart. By Samuel Cowan. 2 vols. (Greening. 21s. net.)
- The World's History: A Survey of Man's Record. Edited by Dr. H. F. Helmolt. Vols. VI. and VIII. (Heinemann.)
- The Great Revolution, 1789-1793. By P. A. Kropotkin. (Heinemann.)
- The Last Days of Marie Antoinette. By G. Lenotre. (Heinemann.)
- A History of Dartmoor. By Basil Thomson. (Heinemann.)
- Queen Anne and her Court. By P. F. W. Ryan. (Hutchinson. 16s. net.)
- Romance of History: The Dutch Republic. By Mary Macgregor. (Jack. 6s.)
- Romance of History: Australia. By Dr. W. H. Lang. (Jack. 6s.)
- Napoleon and the Invasion of England. By H. F. B. Wheeler and A. M. Broadley. 2 vols. (Lane. 32s. net.)
- The American Revolution. Part III. By the Right Hon. Sir George Otto Trevelyan. (Longmans. 12s. 6d. net.)
- The Political History of England. Vol. XII. The Reign

A Selection from CHAPMAN & HALL'S AUTUMN LIST

THE BIBLE AS LITERATURE.

THE LITERARY MAN'S BIBLE.

Edited and arranged by W. L. COURTNEY, M.A., LL.D., Fellow of New College, Oxford. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

THE REV. R. J. CAMPBELL'S NEW WORK.

CHRISTIANITY AND THE SOCIAL ORDER.

By the Rev. R. J. CAMPBELL, M.A., Author of "The New Theology." Crown 8vo, 6s.

WOMEN WORKERS IN THE CHURCH.

WOMEN OF THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND.

By Mrs. AUBREY RICHARDSON. With 16 Portraits. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

A NEW WORK BY W. S. LILLY.

MANY MANSIONS.

Being Studies in Ancient Religions and Modern Thought. By WILLIAM SAMUEL LILLY, Author of "Chapters in European History," "A Century of Revolution," "On Right and Wrong," "On Shibboleths," "The Claims of Christianity," &c. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

THE REAL BOHEMIAN LIFE.

BOHEMIA IN LONDON.

By ARTHUR RANSOME, Author of "The Souls of the Streets," "The Stone Lady," &c. With numerous Illustrations by FRED TAYLOR. Crown 8vo, 6s. net.

A NEW "ROAD" BOOK BY CHARLES G. HARPER.

THE MANCHESTER AND GLASGOW ROAD.

"This Way to Gretna Green." By CHARLES G. HARPER, Author of "The Brighton Road," and other histories of the Roads. With Illustrations by the Author and from Old Time Prints. Two volumes, demy 8vo, 32s.

A SEASONABLE BOOK.

HAUNTED HOUSES.

Tales of the Supernatural, with some account of Hereditary Curses and Family Legends. By CHARLES G. HARPER, Author of "The Old Inns of Old England," &c. With numerous Illustrations by the Author. Demy 8vo, 21s. net.

A BOOK FOR ALL LONDONERS.

THE "PASSER-BY" IN LONDON.

A tribute to Wren, Gibbons, and John Stow, with some chapters on the romance of the old City of London. By W. S. CAMPBELL. With about 100 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 6s.

A HISTORY OF THE ART OF TRANSFER PRINTING.

TRANSFER PRINTING on ENAMELS, PORCELAIN, and POTTERY.

Its Origin and Development in the United Kingdom. By WILLIAM TURNER, F.S.S., Author of "William Adams: An Old English Potter," "The Ceramics of Swansea and Nantgarw," &c. With numerous Illustrations. Royal 8vo, 25s. net.

THE CURE OF CANCER: ITS DEVELOPMENT AND SUCCESS.

THE CONQUEST OF CANCER.

A Discussion of the New Theory of Malignant Disease and its Control by Ferments. By C. W. SALEEBY, M.D., F.R.S. (Edin.). Crown 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

A BOOK FOR THE LOVER OF EVERYTHING THAT'S OLD.

THE COLLECTOR'S MANUAL.

By N. HUDSON MOORE, Author of "The Lace Book," "The Old China Book," "The Old Furniture Book," &c., &c. With 336 Illustrations and with Borders by AMY RICHARDS. 4to, 25s. net.

A HANDSOME CHRISTMAS BOOK.

THE STORY OF SIR LAUNCELOT AND HIS COMPANIONS.

Written and Illustrated by HOWARD PYLE. Demy 8vo 10s. 6d. net.

A NOTABLE BOOK OF LITERARY ESSAYS.

ESSAYS AND ADDRESSES.

By the late JOHN HENRY BRIDGES, M.B., F.R.C.P., sometime Fellow of Oriel College, Oxford, &c. With an Introduction by FREDERIC HARRISON. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

THE GREAT PERSIAN EPIC.

THE SHAH NAMAH OF FARDUSI.

Translated into English Rhymed Verse by ALEXANDER ROGERS. Demy 8vo.

THE CHEAPEST COMPLETE DICKENS.

THE POPULAR EDITION OF THE Complete Works of CHARLES DICKENS.

With Frontispiece and Decorative Title Page. End Papers by CHARLES GREEN. Twenty-two Volumes. Crown 8vo, 1s. net per Volume in Cloth, 2s. net per Volume in Leather.

DICKEN'S FAMOUS CHRISTMAS NUMBERS OF

"ALL THE YEAR ROUND" AND "HOUSEHOLD WORDS."

With the Author's Names to each Chapter. Now Published for the First Time. Complete as originally issued, with a Coloured Frontispiece to each volume, by AUDLEY GUNSTON and A. JULES GOODMAN. Eighteen Volumes, 1s. net each. Cloth; 2s. net each, Leather. In cases containing Nine Volumes, each 10s. net, Cloth; and 21s. net, Leather.

IMPORTANT NEW 6s. NOVELS.

THE SHADOW OF THE UNSEEN.

By BARRY PAIN and JAMES BLYTH.

THE HEART'S BANISHMENT.

By ELLA MACMAHON. Author of "The Other Son," "Jemima Oxendale," &c.

THE FASHIONABLE CHRISTIANS.

By VINCENT BROWN, Author of "A Magdalen's Husband," &c.

THE THINKING MACHINE.

By JACQUES FUTRELLE, Author of "The Chase of the Golden Plate," "The Haunted Bell," &c. Being a true and complete statement of several intricate mysteries which came under the observation of Professor AUGUSTUS S. F. X. VAN DUSEN, F.R.S., M.D.

SEED ON STONY GROUND.

By U. L. MORICHINI. Translated from the Italian by ELLA ST LEGER.

THE BOATS OF THE "GLENCARRIG."

By WILLIAM HOPE HODGSON. Being an Account of their Adventures in the Strange Places of the Earth, after the foundering of the good ship "Glencarrig," through striking upon a hidden rock in the unknown seas to the Southward. As told by John Winterstraw Gent., to his Son James Winterstraw, in the year 1757, and by him committed very properly and legibly to manuscript.

ASHDOD.

By AGNES FARLEY.

THE ELIXIR OF LIFE.

By WILLIAM SATCHELL, Author of "The Toll of the Bush," "The Land of the Lost," &c.

LONDON: CHAPMAN & HALL, LIMITED.

- of Victoria. By Sidney Low. (Longmans. 7s. 6d. net.)
- Grant, Lincoln, and the Freedmen: Reminiscences of the Civil War, with a History of the Work for the Contrabands and Freedmen of the Mississippi Valley, from 1862-1865. By J. Eaton and E. G. Mason. (Longmans.)
- Bombay in the Days of George IV. By F. D. Drewitt. (Longmans.)
- England in the Seven Years' War: A Study in Combined Strategy. By J. S. Corbett. 2 vols. (Longmans.)
- The History of Freedom and Other Essays. By the late Lord Acton. (Macmillan. 10s. net.)
- Historical Essay and Studies. By the late Lord Acton. (Macmillan. 10s. net.)
- Studies in Irish History. By Alice Stopford Green. (Macmillan.)
- The Builders of Florence. By J. Wood Brown. (Methuen. 18s. net.)
- A History of Milan under the Sforza. By Miss C. M. Ady. (Methuen. 10s. net.)
- A History of the Royal Scots Greys. By E. Almack. (Morning. 52s. 6d.)
- History of Venice. By Pompeo Molmenti. Translated by Horatio F. Brown. 3 vols. (Murray. 21s. net each.)
- Studies in Venetian History. By Horatio F. Brown. 2 vols. (Murray.)
- Selected Speeches and Despatches Relating to Canadian Constitutional History. Edited by Professor H. E. Beit and W. L. Grant. (Murray.)
- The Court of Philip IV.: Spain in Decadence. By Major Martin Hume. (Nash. 18s. net.)
- Bath under Beau Nash. By Lewis Melville. (Nash. 15s. net.)
- History of the German People. By Johannes Janssen. Translated by A. M. Christie. Vols. XI. and XII. (Kegan, Paul.)
- A History of the People of the Netherlands. By Professor P. J. Blok, Ph.D. Translated by O. A. Bierstadt. (Putnam.)
- The Victorian Chancellors. Vol. II. By J. B. Atlay. (Smith, Elder. 14s. net.)
- A History of the Minorities. By the Rev. E. M. Tomlinson. (Smith, Elder. 18s. net.)
- Ramtanu Lahiri, Brahman and Reformer: a History of the Renaissance in Bengal. Edited by Sir Roper Lethbridge. (Swan Sonnenschein.)
- The Dawn of a Constitution, or the Reigns of Henry III., Edward I., and Edward III. (1216-1377). By Sir J. H. Ramsay. (Swan Sonnenschein.)
- The Life and Times of the Empress Pulcheria, A.D. 399 to A.D. 452. By Ada B. Teetgen. (Swan Sonnenschein.)
- The History and Ethnography of Africa South of the Zambesi, from the Settlement of the Portuguese at Sofala to the Conquest of Cape Colony by Great Britain. By Dr. G. M. Theal. 3 vols. (Swan Sonnenschein.)
- Secret History of the English Occupation of Egypt. By W. S. Blunt. (Unwin. 15s. net.)
- History of Ireland to the Coming of Henry II. By Arthur Clerigh. (Unwin. 10s. 6d. net.)
- Bonaparte in Egypt and the Egyptians of To-day. (Unwin. 10s. 6d. net.)
- History of Ancient Civilisation. By C. Seignobos. (Unwin. 5s. net.)
- Studies, Historical and Critical. By Professor Pasquale Villari. (Unwin. 15s. net.)
- Studies of the Eighteenth Century in Italy. By Vernon Lee. (Unwin. 21s. net.)
- The Story of Diplomacy: its Makers and Movements. By T. H. S. Escott. (Unwin. 16s.)
- Before and After Waterloo. By Edward Stanley. (Unwin. 18s. net.)
- The Palaces of Crete and their Builders. By Angelo Mosso. (Unwin. 21s.)
- Church History. By Professor Hans von Schubert, translated by M. A. Canney, M.A., with an additional chapter on Religious Movements in England in the Nineteenth Century. By Miss Alice Gardner, of Newnham College. (Williams & Norgate.)

MISCELLANEOUS.

- My Rock Garden. By R. Farrer. (Arnold. 7s. 6d. net.)
- The Life of the Salmon. By W. L. Calderwood. (Arnold. 7s. 6d. net.)
- How to Collect Continental China. By C. H. Wylde. Illustrated. (Bell. 6s. net.)
- How to Collect Postage Stamps. By B. T. K. Smith. Illustrated. (Bell. 6s. net.)
- Introduction to Commercial Law. By F. Tillyard. (Black. 3s. 6d. net.)
- Birds of Britain. By J. L. Bonhote. (Black. 20s. net.)
- The Forester. By J. Nisbet. In 2 vols. (Blackwood. 42s. net.)
- Forest Entomology. By A. T. Gillanders. (Blackwood. 10s. 6d. net.)
- International Law. Part II. War. By J. Westlake, K.C., LL.D. (Cambridge University Press.)
- Collective Ownership otherwise than by Corporations or by means of the Trust. By C. T. Carr, M.A., LL.B. (Cambridge University Press.)
- Farm Management. By Professor F. W. Card. (Constable. 8s. 6d. net.)
- The Ghosts of Piccadilly. By G. S. Street. (Constable. 10s. 6d. net.)
- History of English Music. By E. Walker. (Clarendon Press.)
- Haunted Houses. By Charles G. Harper. (Chapman & Hall. 21s. net.)
- Trees and their Life Histories. By Percy Groom, M.A., D.Sc. (Cassell. 25s. net.)
- Flower Grouping in English, Scotch, and Irish Gardens. Text by Rose Kingsley, the Hon. Emily Lawless, Walter P. Wright, and others. (Dent. 21s. net.)
- Nature's Own Gardens. By M. U. Clarke. (Dent. 21s. net.)
- Legend and Folk-Lore of the Holy Land. By J. E. Hanauer. With Introduction by M. Pickthall. (Duckworth. 8s. net.)
- The Construction and Reconstruction of the Human Body. A Manual of the Therapeutics of Exercise. By Eugen Sandow. (Griffiths. 12s. 6d. net.)
- Days Off. By H. Van Dyke, D.D., LL.D. (Hodder & Stoughton. 6s.)
- British Country Life in Spring and Summer. Edited by E. V. Thomas. (Hodder & Stoughton. 8s. 6d. net.)
- Extinct Birds. By the Hon. Walter Rothschild, M.P. (Hutchinson. £25 net.)
- Buddhist Essays. By Paul Dahlke. (Macmillan.)
- Bird Life in Spain. By Captain W. Vernon. (Murray.)
- The Complete Shot. By G. T. Teasdale-Buckell. (Methuen. 12s. 6d. net.)
- Fox-hunting Recollections. By Sir R. Graham, Bart. (Nash. 10s. net.)
- Criminals and Crime: Some Facts and Suggestions. By Sir Robert Anderson, K.C.B. (Nisbet. 5s. net.)
- Farmer's Cyclopedia of Live Stock. By E. V. Wilcox, Ph.D., and Clarence Beaman Smith. (Kegan, Paul.)
- Fifty-two Nature Rambles: a Series of Open-air Talks for Young People. By W. Percival Westell, F.L.S. (Religious Tract Society. 3s. 6d.)
- Adventures in Birdland. By O. G. Pike. (Religious Tract Society. 6s. net.)
- The Heritage of Dress: being Notes on the History and Evolution of Clothes. By W. M. Webb. Illustrated. (Grant Richards.)
- Standard Reference Library. (New vols.) English Quotations. By R. Smith. Slang and Phrase of the Day: a Dictionary of Passing English, forming a Supplement to Farmer's "Slang Dictionary." By J. R. Ware. (Routledge. 7s. 6d. net each.)
- A Dictionary of Spanish Quotations. By the late T. B. Harbottle. Revised and partly written by Major Hume, of the Public Record Office. (Swan Sonnenschein.)
- The Social Fetich. By Lady Grove. (Smith, Elder. 5s. net.)
- Animal Life. By F. W. Gamble. (Smith, Elder. 6s. net.)

NEW EDITIONS AND REPRINTS.

- Library Edition of Ruskin. Vols. XXXIII. and XXXIV. (Allen.)

MESSRS. BELL'S LIST.

The Full List of Messrs. Bell's New and Forthcoming Books will be sent on application.

NOW READY.—Demy 8vo, with 7 Portraits 15s. net.

THE ELIZABETHAN RELIGIOUS SETTLEMENT.

A Study of Contemporary Documents. By HENRY NORBERT BIRT, O.S.B., Priest at Downside Abbey.

This is in no way a controversial book, but is simply an attempt to estimate the value of the account given by the earlier historians of the national change of religion effected in 1559. By a study of the original letters, despatches, official returns, &c., of the period, an endeavour is made to reconstruct a picture of what actually happened, and to gauge the sentiment of the bulk of the nation towards the religious changes.

Prospectus on application.

NOW READY—Post 8vo, with Portrait, 10s. 6d. net.

THE ROMAN JOURNALS OF FERDINAND GREGOROVIVS.

Edited by FRIEDRICH ALTHAUS. Translated from the Second German Edition by Mrs. GUSTAVUS W. HAMILTON.

These Journals of the Author of "A History of the City of Rome in the Middle Ages" constitute not only an interesting contribution to the biography of a distinguished writer and man, but bring vividly before the readers a picture of his time—drawn under the immediate impression of historical events—the great epoch of the modern transformation of Rome and Italy, of which from 1852 until 1874 he was an eyewitness.

Prospectus on application.

NOW READY—3 Vols. fcap. 8vo, 2s. net each.

A HISTORY OF THE POPES: their Church and State. By LEOPOLD VON RANKE. Translated by E. FOSTER. New and Revised Edition, with considerable additions. Also in Leather, 3s. net. each. [York Library.

* * * This Edition has been revised throughout by the latest German edition, the Chapters on Pius IX. and the Vatican Council have been translated for the first time, and a new and very full Index has been added.

JUST PUBLISHED.—16mo, 2s. 6d. net.

DAILY THOUGHTS FROM HORACE.

Selected and Arranged by the Hon. F. H. WATKINS, D.S.O., Commissioner of Turk's and Caicos Island.

JUST PUBLISHED.—Crown 4to, 5s. net.

THE PETER PAN PICTURE BOOK.

The Story of Peter Pan retold by DANIEL O'CONNOR, from the Play by J. M. Barrie. With 28 Illustrations in Colour by ALICE B. WOODWARD.

Also an EDITION DE LUXE, limited to 250 copies, the Text on Hand-made paper, and the Plates mounted. 10s. 6d. net.

[Ready shortly.]

The various scenes of this extraordinarily popular children's play have been ideally reproduced by the sympathetic art of Miss Woodward, and are beautifully printed in colour by Messrs. Hentschel. There will be no more popular Christmas book for young people.

Prospectus on application.

READY OCTOBER 16th. 31s. 6d. net.

CHARLES TURNER, ENGRAVER.

By ALFRED WHITMAN. Author of "The Print Collector's Handbook," "Masters of Mezzotint," &c. Small Colomberg 8vo, with 32 Illustrations in Colotype.

Also 50 large paper copies on hand-made paper, with the Plates on Japanese Vellum. £3 3s. net.

* * * This volume is uniform with Mr. Whitman's volumes on Cousins and S. W. Reynolds, and contains a life of Turner, with a full descriptive catalogue of engravings executed by him.

Prospectus on Application.

NOW READY.—Post 8vo, 6s. net.

HOW TO COLLECT POSTAGE-STAMPS.

By BERTRAM T. K. SMITH. With 48 Plates, illustrating upwards of 750 specimens.

A comprehensive and up-to-date general handbook on Postage Stamps by a well-known collector and expert.

Prospectus on application.

NEW VOLUME OF THE "BRITISH ARTISTS" SERIES.

GEORGE MORLAND.

By G. C. WILLIAMSON, Litt.D. With 4 Coloured Plates and 78 other Illustrations, post 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

Prospectus on application.

BOHN'S LIBRARIES.

"The new series of Bohn's Libraries, on which judicious book-buyers have long learnt to keep a careful eye."—ATHENÆUM.

FULL CATALOGUE OF THE LIBRARIES ON APPLICATION.

DYER'S HISTORY OF MODERN EUROPE.

From the Fall of Constantinople. Third Edition, Revised and Continued to the End of the Nineteenth Century. By ARTHUR HASSALL, M.A.

6 Vols., 3s. 6d. each.—Bohn's Standard Library.

"For the general reader, and even for the historical student who is content with anything short of original research, Dyer's book is indispensable."—St. James's Gazette.

London: GEORGE BELL & SONS, York House, Portugal St., W.C.

BLACKIE'S LIST

A FASCINATING WORK.

IN THE LAND OF PEARL AND GOLD: A Pioneer's Wanderings in the Back-Blocks and Pearling-Grounds of Australia and New Guinea. By ALEXANDER MACDONALD, F.R.G.S., Author of "In Search of El Dorado," "The Lost Explorers," &c. Fully Illustrated. Demy 8vo, cloth, 10s. 6d. net.

THE LIFE OF HENTY.

GEORGE HENTY: The Story of an Active Life. By G. MANVILLE FENN. Illustrated. Crown 8vo, cloth elegant, 7s. 6d.

A NEW ANTHOLOGY.

THE CALL OF THE HOMELAND: A Collection of English Verse. Selected and Arranged by R. P. SCOTT, LL.D., and KATHARINE T. WALLAS. Crown 8vo, cloth elegant, gilt top, 4s. 6d. net.

AN IMPORTANT WORK.

THOMAS GODOLPHIN ROOPER, late H.M. Inspector of Schools: A Selection from his Writings. Edited, with a Memoir, by R. G. TATTON. Demy 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d. net.

NEW BOOKS FOR BOYS.

TWO NEW BOOKS BY CAPTAIN BRERETON.

WITH WOLSELEY TO KUMASI: A Story of the First Ashanti War. Illustrated by GORDON BROWNE, R.I. Large Crown 8vo, cloth elegant, olive edges, 6s.

JONES OF THE 64th: A Tale of the Battles of Assaye and Laswaree. Illustrated by W. RAINEY, R.I. Crown 8vo, cloth elegant, olive edges, 5s.

TWO NEW BOOKS BY ALEX. MACDONALD, F.R.C.S.

THE PEARL SEEKERS: A Story of Adventure in the Southern Seas. Illustrated by EDWARD S. HODGSON. Large crown 8vo, cloth elegant, olive edges, 6s.

THE QUEST OF THE BLACK OPALS: A Story of Adventure in the Heart of Australia. Illustrated by W. RAINEY, R.I. Crown 8vo, cloth elegant, olive edges, 5s.

NEW BOOKS FOR GIRLS.

By BESSIE MARCHANT.

SISTERS OF SILVER CREEK: A Story of Western Canada. Illustrated by ROBERT HOPE. Crown 8vo, cloth elegant, olive edges, 5s.

By BESSIE MARCHANT.

NO ORDINARY GIRL: A Story of Central America. Illustrated by FRANCES EWAN. Crown 8vo, cloth elegant, olive edges, 3s. 6d.

By LILIAN F. WEVILL.

BETTY'S FIRST TERM: A School Story. Illustrated by ARTHUR H. BUCKLAND. Crown 8vo, cloth elegant, olive edges, 3s. 6d.

By DOROTHEA MOORE.

PAMELA'S HERO: A Tale of the Gordon Riots. Illustrated by ARTHUR A. DIXON. Crown 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d.

BLACKIE'S CHILDREN'S ANNUAL.

FOURTH YEAR OF ISSUE.

A Handsome Volume of 192 pp., with over 150 Illustrations, including 40 Full-page Pictures in Full Colour by the best Artists. Picture boards, cloth back, 3s. 6d.; cloth, gilt edges 5s.

NEW PICTURE BOOKS.

THE STORY OF THE WEATHERCOCK. Stories for Children by EVELYN SHARP. With 16 Coloured Plates and the Text fully Illustrated with Black-and-White Drawings by CHARLES ROBINSON. Large 4to, cloth, full gilt and gilt edges, 6s. net.

HEROIC LEGENDS. The Best of the Old Legends retold by AGNES GROZIER HERBERTSON. Illustrated with 16 beautifully Coloured Plates by HELEN STRATTON. Square 8vo, cloth elegant, full gilt and gilt edges, 6s. net.

THE RHYME OF A RUN, and other Verse. Written and Pictured by FLORENCE HARRISON. With 24 Drawings in full colour, beautifully reproduced and mounted on grey art paper, and many in outline. Sumptuously bound, 6s. net.

HANS ANDERSEN'S FAIRY TALES. Illustrated by HELEN STRATTON, with about 30 beautifully Coloured Plates and a large number of Black-and-White Drawings. Large crown 8vo, cloth elegant, olive edges, 5s.

A COLOURED BOOKLET POST FREE.—Messrs. BLACKIE & SON have prepared a Booklet containing particulars of Gift Books, beautifully printed in colours on Art paper, and containing many fac-simile coloured pictures, will be posted free to any address.

BLACKIE & SON, LTD., 50, OLD BAILEY, E.C.

- Great Masters in Painting and Sculpture. Edited by G. C. Williamson, Litt.D. Cheaper Reissue. (Bell. 3s. 6d. net.)
- Lucretius. A Prose Translation. By H. A. J. Munro. With Introduction by J. D. Duff, M.D. (Bell. 5s.)
- The Prose Works of Jonathan Swift. Edited by Temple Scott. Introduction by the late W. E. H. Lecky. In 12 vols. (Bell. 5s. each.)
- Dyer's History of Modern Europe, from the Fall of Constantinople. By Arthur Hassall, M.A. 6 vols. (Bell. 3s. 6d. each.)
- The Plays of Beaumont and Fletcher. Vol. V. Edited by A. R. Waller, M.A. (Cambridge University Press.)
- George Gascoigne: The Posies. Edited by J. W. Cunliffe, D.Litt. (Cambridge University Press.)
- Giles and Phineas Fletcher: Poems. Edited by F. S. Boas, M.A. (Cambridge University Press.)
- The People's Library. (Cassell.)
- The Life of Charles Dickens. By J. Forster. (Chapman & Hall. Cloth 2s. 6d. net.)
- The Popular Edition of the Complete Works of Charles Dickens. 22 vols. (Chapman & Hall. 1s. net per vol. in cloth. 2s. net per vol. in leather.)
- Several Volumes in the King's Classics. (Chatto & Windus.)
- Several Volumes in the Tudor and Stuart Library. (Clarendon Press.)
- Several Volumes in the World's Classics. (Clarendon Press.)
- Great Englishmen of the 16th Century. By Sidney Lee. (Constable. 5s. net.)
- The Kingdom of the Yellow Robe. (Constable. 5s. net.)
- Alexander Hamilton. By F. S. Oliver. (Constable. 6s. net.)
- Volumes in Everyman's Library. (Dent.)
- William Hogarth. By Austin Dobson, with Introduction by Sir Walter Armstrong. Illustrated. (Heinemann. 6s. net.)
- Personal Recollections of Henry Irving. By Bram Stoker. Illustrated. (Heinemann.)
- Jeanne D'Arc, Maid of Orleans, Deliverer of France. By T. D. Murray. Illustrated. (Heinemann. 6s. net.)
- The Plays of W. E. Henley and Robert Louis Stevenson. In 1 vol. (Heinemann. 6s.)
- Main Currents in Nineteenth Century Literature. By G. Brandes. 6 vols. Illustrated. (Heinemann. 6s. net each.)
- The Diary of Master William Silence: A Study of Shakespeare and of Elizabethan Sport. By the Rt. Hon. D. H. Madden. (Longmans. 6s. 6d. net.)
- Ballads and Lyrics of Old France, with other Poems. By Andrew Lang. (Longmans. Cloth, gilt top, 2s. net.)
- Wild and Cultivated Cotton Plants of the World. (Longmans. 30s. net.)
- An Inquiry into Socialism. By T. Kirkup. (Longmans. 4s. 6d. net.)
- Gleanings from Venetian History. By F. M. Crawford. 1 vol. (Macmillan. 8s. 6d. net.)
- Rambles and Studies in Greece. By Rev. J. P. Mahaffy, C.V.O. (Macmillan. 5s. net.)
- The Prose Works of Rudyard Kipling. The Works will be issued in fortnightly Volumes from September, 1907. (Macmillan. 5s. net per vol.)
- The Diary of John Evelyn, 1620-1706. With an Introduction and Notes by Austin Dobson, Hon. LL.D. Edin. (Macmillan. 3s. 6d.)
- The Poetical Works of John Keats. A re-issue of the edition, with Introduction and Notes, by W. T. Arnold. (Macmillan. 3s. 6d.)
- The Works of Oscar Wilde. (Methuen. 12s. 6d. net each vol.)
- Santa Teresa. Illustrated. 1 vol. By G. C. Graham. (Nash. 10s. 6d. net.)
- Essays in Socialism. By E. Belfort Bax. People's Edition. (E. Grant Richards.)
- Library of Standard and Historical Literature. New vols. (Routledge. 5s. net each.)
- Library of Early Novelists. Edited by E. A. Baker, M.A. New vols. (Routledge. 6s. net each.)
- London Library. Definitive Library Editions. Each with an etched or photogravure portrait. New vols. (Routledge. 2s. 6d. net each.)
- The Life of Wellington. The Restoration of the Martial Power of Great Britain. By the Rt. Hon. Sir H. Maxwell, Bart., M.P. In 1 vol. (Sampson Low.)
- Essays Speculative and Suggestive. By J. A. Symonds. With Introduction by H. F. Brown. (Smith, Elder. 7s. 6d.)
- The Voyage of the Discovery. By Capt. R. F. Scott, C.V.O., R.N. In 2 vols. (Smith, Elder. 10s. net.)
- The Science of Ethics. By Leslie Stephen. (Smith, Elder. 7s. 6d. net.)

PHILOSOPHY.

- The New Ethics. Being chapters on various aspects of Humanitarianism. By Howard Moore. (Bell. 3s. 6d. net.)
- Totemism. By J. G. Frazer. (Black. 3s. 6d. net.)
- Early Greek Philosophy. By J. Burnet. (Black. 10s. 6d. net.)
- The Development of Greek Philosophy. By R. Adamson. (Blackwood. 10s. 6d. net.)
- Elements of Psychology. By S. H. Mellone. (Blackwood. 5s.)
- Many Mansions. Being Studies in Ancient Religions and Modern Thought. By W. S. Lilly. (Chapman & Hall. 12s. 6d. net.)
- Ethics of Revolt. By Dr. G. Macdonald. (Duckworth. 5s. net.)
- The Prolongation of Human Life. Optimistic Essays. By Elie Metchnikoff. Edited by P. Chalmers Mitchell, D.Sc., F.R.S. (Heinemann. 12s. 6d. net.)
- Scholasticism, Old and New: an Introduction to Scholastic Philosophy—Medieval and Modern. By M. de Wulf. (Longmans. 6s. net.)
- The Philosophy of Common Sense. By F. Harrison. (Macmillan. 7s. 6d. net.)
- The Soul of the World. By H. F. Hall. (Macmillan.)
- The Immortality of Animals and the Relation of Man as a Guardian, from a Biblical and Philosophical Hypothesis. By E. D. Buckner, M.D. (Moring. 5s. net.)
- Lucretius, Epicurean and Poet. By J. Masson, LL.D. (Murray. 15s. net.)
- Thinking, Feeling, Doing. An Introduction to Mental Science. By E. W. Scripture, Ph.D. (Putnams. 9s. net.)
- Human Justice for Those at the Bottom. By C. C. Cotterill. (Smith, Elder. 2s. 6d.)
- Thought and Things: a Study of the Development and Meaning of Thought or Genetic Logic. By J. M. Baldwin. In 3 vols. (Swan Sonnenschein.)
- The History of Philosophy. Based on work of Dr. J. E. Erdmann. 5th edition, revised by his son, Dr. W. B. Erdmann. (Swan Sonnenschein.)
- The Will to Doubt, or the Place of Doubt in Human Experience. By A. H. Lloyd. (Swan Sonnenschein.)
- Attention. By W. B. Pillsbury. (Swan Sonnenschein.)
- Mental Pathology in Relation to Psychology. A translation by T. Loveday, M.A. (Swan Sonnenschein.)
- The Certainty of Religion. By F. S. Turner. (Swan Sonnenschein.)
- Early Christian Ethics in the West, from Clement to Ambrose. By Rev. Professor Scullard, M.A., D.D. 1 vol. (Williams & Norgate.)
- Outlines of Psychology. By Wilhelm Wundt. Translated, with the co-operation of the author, by C. H. Judd, Ph.D. (Williams & Norgate. 8s. net.)

POETRY.

- A Volume of Lyrics. By Alfred Noyes. (Blackwood. 5s. net.)
- Ballads and Poems. By Members of the Glasgow Ballad Club. (Blackwood. 5s. net.)
- Poems and Ballads of Goethe. Translated by W. E. Aytoun and Sir T. Martin. (Blackwood. 6s. net.)
- Translation of Heine's Buch der Lieder. By J. Todhunter. (Clarendon Press.)
- The Pongo Papers. By Lord Alfred Douglas. (Greening.)
- From the Hills of Dream, and Later Poems. By Fiona Macleod. (Heinemann.)
- The Collected Poems of Dora S. Shorter. With an Introduction by George Meredith. (Hodder & Stoughton. 6s. net.)
- New Poems. By Stephen Phillips. (Lane. 4s. 6d. net.)

A Selection from Cassell & Company's Autumn List

THE PENTLAND EDITION OF THE WORKS OF ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON. Edited by Edmund Gosse. (Limited to 1,500 Copies.) £10 10s. net. The Set of 20 Volumes, containing a number of Photogravure Plates, including some rare Portraits of R. L. Stevenson.

A HISTORY & DESCRIPTION OF ITALIAN MAJOLICA. By M. L. Solon. Preface by William Burton, F.C.S. With 24 Coloured Plates and numerous Half-tone Illustrations. 42s. net. Limited Edition.

THE NEW BOOK OF THE DOG. By Robert Leighton, assisted by Eminent Authorities. Illustrated with 21 Coloured Plates, and with numerous Photographic Portraits of Famous Dogs, &c. 25s. net.

TREES AND THEIR LIFE HISTORIES. By Percy Groom, M.A., D.Sc., F.L.S. With 109 Full-page Plates, and upwards of 150 other Illustrations. 25s. net.

THE ROYAL FAMILY BY PEN AND CAMERA. By Sarah A. Tooley. With 120 Full-page Reproductions of Photographs by John Russell. 12s. net.

PIONEERS OF EVOLUTION. By Edward Clodd. With Special Introduction by the Author and Four Photogravure Plates. Cloth, 5s.

MR. PICKWICK'S CHRISTMAS. By Charles Dickens. 6 Coloured Plates, 4 Full-page and other Pictures by G. A. Williams. 6s. net.

A CHRISTMAS CAROL, AND THE CRICKET ON THE HEARTH. By Charles Dickens. 2 Coloured Plates and 7 Full-page illustrations by G. A. Williams. 6s. net.

POPULAR FALLACIES. By A. S. E. Ackermann, B.Sc. (Lond.). With 8 Full-page Plates. 6s.

THE ROMANCE OF MEDICINE. By Ronald Campbell Macfie, M.A. (Aberd.), M.B., C.M. With 3 Coloured and 4 Black-and-White Plates. 6s.

ALICE IN WONDERLAND. By Lewis Carroll. Specially Illustrated by Charles Robinson. The Volume contains 8 Coloured Plates and 112 Illustrations in Black and White. 6s. net.

THREE YEARS WITH THUNDERBOLT. By Ambrose Pratt. With Frontispiece in Colour. 6s.

THE HOUSE BEAUTIFUL AND USEFUL. By J. H. Elder-Duncan. With numerous illustrations from Photographs. 5s. net.

THE FAIRYLAND OF LIVING THINGS. By Richard Kearton, F.Z.S., and Cherry Kearton. 3s. 6d.

HARRY ROUNTREE'S ANNUAL. With Contributions by Popular Authors. 3s. 6d.

THE LAND OF ENCHANTMENT. Illustrated by ARTHUR RACKHAM, A.R.W.S. Printed upon imitation Japanese Vellum in handsome cloth binding. 7s. 6d. net.

THEROMANCE OF THE SALVATION ARMY. By Hilda Friederichs. 3s. 6d.

DENIZENS OF THE DEEP. By F. Martin Duncan, F.R.P.S., &c. 5s.

Popular New Novels

6s. each.

With Coloured Frontispieces or with Illustrations.

KATE MEREDITH. By C. J. Cutcliffe Hyme.

THE COMING OF ISOBEL. By Helen Wallace.

GOLDEN MORN. By H. A. Hinkson.

THE THROWBACK. By A. H. Lewis.

THE KING OF KERISAL. By Mayne Lindsay.

PRETTY PENELOPE. By Effie Adelaide Rowlands.

THE HOLE IN THE COAT. By Charles Eddy.

THE LORD OF THE DYKE. By Walter Wood.

THE SPINNING OF FATE. By Agnes C. Mitchell.

THE HEIRESS OF DENSLEY WOLD. By Florence Warden.

THE IMMORTAL LIGHT. By John Mastin.

AN EXPERIMENT IN PERFECTION. By Marion T. D. Barton.

A WINGED VICTORY. By Robert M. Lovell.

THROUGH WINTRY TERRORS. By Dora Sigerson Shorter.

THE SLANDERERS. By Warwick Deeping.

THE ADMIRABLE DAVIS. By Ronald Legge.

THE HOUSE OF MURGATROYD. By C. C. Andrews.

Please write for Complete Catalogue.

CASSELL & CO. LTD., London, Paris, New York, Toronto, and Melbourne

HARRAP & Co's. ANNOUNCEMENTS.

N.B.—The attention of Booklovers is particularly drawn to our New and Complete Illustrated List of BOOKS BEAUTIFUL. Our Bindings are even more attractive than last year, and New Styles in Velvet Persian, Cowhide, and Rough Seal have been produced for this season. The selection is a wide one, and for presentation purposes no prettier books are made.

The most Handsome and Attractive Gift-Book of the 1907 Season.

The Myths of Greece & Rome

THEIR STORIES, SIGNIFICATION, AND ORIGIN.

By H. A. GUERBER.

With Sixty-four Exquisite Full-page Illustrations, including the Best Works of LORD LEIGHTON, SIR E. BURNE-JONES, SOLOMON J. SOLOMON, G. F. WATTS, HERBERT DRAPER, HENRIETTA RAE, HARRY BATES, HON. JOHN COLLIER, SIR E. J. POYNTER, MICHAEL ANGELO, RAPHAEL, RUBENS, CANOVA, GUIDO RENI, PHIDIAS, BERNINI, TITIAN, VELASQUEZ, &c., &c.

Demy 8vo, 8in. by 5½in., 416 pp. Letterpress. Bound in Handsome Cloth Cover, with Rich Design, Gilt Top.

Price 7s. 6d. net. Also bound in Half Morocco 15s. net.

Told Through the Ages. 15 Vols.

NEW VOLUMES:

LEGENDS OF GREECE AND ROME.

THE BOOK OF RUSTEM.

STORIES FROM THE AENEID.

STORIES FROM CHAUCER.

STORIES FROM THE OLD TESTAMENT.

Half bound in leather and green cloth, 2s. 6d. net. Also in a new style, printed on a Pure Rag Paper, Cloth Gilt extra 3s. 6d. net.

Illustrated List Now Ready.

GEORGE G. HARRAP & CO., 15, York Street, Covent Garden, W.C.

Sampson, Low, Marston & Co., Ltd.

Please send post card, when Full Illustrated Autumn List will be forwarded.

6/- EACH.

Small quarto, cloth extra (6½ by 9), gilt top, 6/- each

Miss L. M. Allcott's Famous Stories.

New Illustrated Edition.

For many years a better Edition of Miss Allcott's charming stories has been asked for, but hitherto, with the exception of "Jo's Boys," only the cheap Editions have been available. The new Illustrated Editions at Six Shillings, now produced for the first time, have been entirely re-set.

LITTLE WOMEN, with Little Women Wedded.

ROSE IN BLOOM.

LITTLE MEN.

AN OLD-FASHIONED GIRL.

JO'S BOYS.

UNDER THE LILACS.

EIGHT COUSINS.

JACK AND JILL.

Small quarto, cloth extra, with coloured frontispiece and other illustrations.

The Advent of Arthur.

6/-

By ENID LEIGH HUNT. In Enid Leigh Hunt, a great-daughter of Leigh Hunt, the charming essayist, there has appeared a writer for girls whose due place is in the front rank.

Small quarto, cloth extra, with illustrations in colour and half-tone.

Life on the Ocean.

6/-

By GEORGE LITTLE. With an Introduction by W. CLARK RUSSELL. The author spent twenty years in the American Merchant Service as boy, mate, or captain.

Small quarto, cloth extra, with coloured frontispiece, and other illustrations.

Sandy Carmichael.

6/-

By CUTCLIFFE J. HYNÉ. In this story of adventure the author has depicted life on two of the Pacific Islands at a time when European in luence was not felt, when the islanders were in a state of barbarism and when they were cannibals.

Small quarto, cloth extra, with coloured frontispiece and other illustrations.

The Secret of the Sandhills.

6/-

By FRANCIS MARLOWE. A book that is certain to become a favourite with boys. It is a tale of adventure, and the brisk move of the narrative never ceases.

Demy 8vo, cloth extra.

Under North Star and Southern Cross.

6/-

By FRANCIS SINCLAIR. Many readers will remember Mr. Sinclair's "Where the Sun Sets," and in this work he once more places most of his scenes in the Southern Pacific, and rivals the charm and glamour of that marvellous region.

London: SAMPSON, LOW, MARSTON & Co., Ltd., 100, Southwark Street, S.E.

- A Garden of Shadows: Poems. By Ethel T. Atkinson. (Macmillan.)
 Poems Old and New. By Margaret L. Woods. (Macmillan.)
 Mors Virgili. A Poem. By T. H. Warren. (Murray.)
 New Poems: Including Apollo and the Seaman. By Herbert Trench. (Methuen. 6s.)
 Spring in London. A Poem. By A. E. (Smith, Elder. 2s. net.)

MODERN LANGUAGES.

- George Sand: Les Maîtres Sonneurs. Illustrated by Miss M. V. Wheelhouse. Balzac: Les Chouans. Illustrated by J. Blake Green. George Sand: La Mare du Diable. Illustrated by Gertrude Leese. (Bell. 5s. net each.)
 Victor Hugo. Poems. Edited by H. W. Eve, M.A. (Cambridge University Press.)
 The Oxford Book of French Verse. Chosen and Edited by St. John Lucas. (Clarendon Press.)
 Voyage aux Mers Polaires. By Lieutenant René Bellot. Edited by H. J. Chaytor. (Clarendon Press.)
 Servitude et Grandeur Militaires. By Alfred de Vigny. Edited by C. L. Freeman. (Clarendon Press.)
 Le Roman d'un Jeune Homme Pauvre. By Octave Feuillet. Edited by J. Lafitte. (Clarendon Press.)
 Iambes et Poèmes. By Auguste Barbier. Edited by Ch. M. Garnier. (Clarendon Press.)
 Contes et Nouvelles. By Prosper Mérimée. Edited by J. E. Michell. (Clarendon Press.)
 La Légende des Siècles. By Victor Hugo. Edited by G. F. Bridge. (Clarendon Press.)
 Les Classiques Français. Edited by H. Warner Allen. Bossuet (Oraisons Funèbres), préface de René Doumic. La Fontaine (Fables Chosies), préface de Jules Claretie. Victor Hugo (Poèmes, 1822-1865), préface de L. Aguetant. Lamartine (Prose et Verse), préface de René Doumic. Montaigne (Essais), préface d'Émile Faguet. Boileau (Satires Épiques et l'Art Poétique), préface d'Augustin Filon. Beranger (Chansons), préface de Jacques Normand. (Dent. 1s. 6d. net each.)
 The Temple Molière. L'Étourdi ou les Contre-Temps, La Jalousie de Barbouillé et le Médecin Volant. (Dent. 1s. 6d. net each.)

SCIENCE.

- A Treatise on Hydraulics. By W. C. Unwin. (Black. 12s. 6d. net.)
 A Century's Progress in Astronomy. By H. Macpherson, jun. (Blackwood. 6s. net.)
 Practical Nursing. By I. Stewart and H. E. Cuff. (Blackwood. 5s. net.)
 Side Lights on Alcohol. By "Medicus Abstinens." (C.E.T.S. 2s. 6d. net.)
 Studies in the Anatomy of Ancient India. Part I. By A. F. R. Hoernle. (Clarendon Press.)
 Index Kewensis. Supplement III. Bringing the names down to 1905. (Clarendon Press.)
 Lectures on Evolution. By E. B. Poulton. (Clarendon Press.)
 European Animals: Their Geological History and Geographical Distribution. By R. F. Scharff. (Constable. 7s. 6d. net.)
 The Practical Design of Irrigation Works. By W. G. Bligh, M.Inst.C.E. (Constable. 21s. net.)
 A Text Book of Cytology. By Charles Walker. (Constable. 7s. 6d. net.)
 Air Ships Past and Present. By A. Hildebrandt. Translated by W. H. Story. (Constable. 10s. 6d. net.)
 The Corpuscular Theory of Matter. By J. J. Thomson, D.Sc., LL.D., F.R.S. (Constable. 7s. 6d. net.)
 Sewage Disposal Works. By H. P. Raikes. (Constable. 16s. net.)
 Metabolism and Practical Medicine. By Carl von Noorden. 3 vols. (Heinemann. 52s. 6d. net.)
 Neolithic Dew-Ponds and Cattle-Ways. By Arthur J. Hubbard. (Longmans. 4s. 6d. net.)
 Hydraulics. By S. Dunkerley. (Longmans. 10s. 6d. net.)
 A History of Astronomy. By W. W. Bryant. (Methuen. 7s. 6d. net.)
 The Care of the Body. By Francis Cavanagh. (Methuen. 7s. 6d. net.)

- On the Diagnosis and Treatment of Surgical Affections of the Knee. By Sir W. H. Bennett, C.B., &c. (Nisbet.)
 A History of Nursing. By L. L. Dock and M. A. Nutting. (Putnam's. 25s. net.)
 The Brewer's Analyst. By R. Douglas Bailey. (Kegan Paul. 12s. 6d. net.)
 The Evolution of Modern Physics. By Lucien Poincaré. (Kegan Paul. 5s.)
 The Forces of Nature. By Dr. Gustave Le Bon. (Kegan Paul. 5s.)
 The Family Doctor. By E. Barrett, M.B., B.S. Durh., M.R.C.S. (Routledge. 3s. 6d.)
 The Dogs' Medical Dictionary. By A. J. Swell, M.R.C.V.S. (Routledge. 5s.)
 The Horse in the Stable and in the Field. By "Stonehenge" (J. H. Walsh). Revised and partly rewritten by H. Leeney, M.R.C.V.S. (Routledge, 30s.)
 The Romance of Science: Turbines. By Engineer-Commander A. E. Tompkins. (S.P.C.K. 3s. 6d.)
 The Port of London and the Thames Barrage. A series of expert Studies and Reports. Edited by T. W. Barber, M.Inst.C.E. (Swan Sonnenschein.)
 The Student's Text Book of Zoology. By A. Sedgwick, M.A. In 3 vols. Illustrated. (Swan Sonnenschein.)

SOCIOLOGY AND POLITICS.

- An Introduction to Child Study. By W. B. Drummond. (Arnold. 6s. net.)
 The Child's Mind: its Growth and Training. By W. E. Urwick. (Arnold. 4s. 6d. net.)
 Suggestion in Education. By M. W. Keatings. (Black. 4s. 6d. net.)
 A Consideration of the State of Ireland in the Nineteenth Century. By G. L. Lampson. (Constable. 18s. net.)
 The France of To-day. By Barrett Wendell. (Constable. 6s. net.)
 The Procedure of the House of Commons. A Study of its History and Present Form. By Joseph Redlich. With an Introduction and Supplementary Chapter by Sir Courtenay Ilbert, K.C.S.I. 3 vols. (Constable. 31s. 6d. net.)
 The Russian Peasant. By Dr. H. P. Kennard. (Laurie. 6s. net.)
 Work and Wages: in Continuation of Lord Brassey's "Work and Wages" and "Foreign Work and Wages." Vol. II. Wages and Employment. By Sydney J. Chapman, M.A. With an Introduction by Lord Brassey. (Longmans.)
 Origin and Development of the Moral Ideas. By Edward Westermarck, Ph.D. Vol. II. (Macmillan.)
 The Universities of the Nation. A series of Addresses by the Right Rev. Lord Bishop of Hereford. (Macmillan.)
 Woman Through the Ages. By Emil Reich. (Methuen. 21s. net.)
 Woman in Transition. By Annette M. B. Meakin. (Methuen. 6s.)
 Co-operative Industry. By Ernest Aves. (Methuen. 6s.)
 The South African Natives: their Present Condition and Progress. Edited by the South African Native Races Committee. (Murray.)
 Municipal Ownership. By Major Leonard Darwin. (Murray.)
 The Book of the Child. By F. D. How. (Pitman. 3s. 6d. net.)
 Woman's Suffrage. The Case Against Woman Suffrage. (Alston Rivers. 3s. net.)

THEOLOGY.

- Bible Truth through Eye and Ear. By G. V. Reichel. (Allenson. 3s. 6d. net.)
 The Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs. Translated and Edited by R. H. Charles. (Black. 15s. net.)
 Exploratio Evangelica: A Survey of the Foundations of Christianity. (Black. 5s. net.)
 Notes on New Testament Criticism. By E. A. Abbott. (Black. 7s. 6d. net.)
 The Life of Christ in Recent Research. By Dr. W. Sanday. (Clarendon Press.)
 The Religious Teachers of Greece. By the late James Adam, M.A., Litt.D. (Clark.)
 Canon and Text of the New Testament. By Professor Caspar René Gregory, D.D., LL.D. (Clark.)

SWAN SONNENSCHN & CO., LIMITED.

THE PORT OF LONDON AND THE THAMES BARRAGE.

A Series of Expert Studies and Reports. Comprising Independent Studies and Investigations by the Engineer to the Thames Barrage Committee, T. W. BARBER, M. Inst. C.E.; and by C. J. DIBBIN, F.I.C., F.C.S., F.R.M.S.; E. T. HENMELL, M. Inst. C.E.; CLAYTON BEADLE, F.R. Met. Soc., F.C.S.; D. URQUHART, Thames Iron Works. Issued by the Thames Barrage Committee. With Maps and Plates. Crown 4to, 12s. 6d. net.

PRINCE KRAPOTKIN'S MEMOIRS OF A REVOLUTIONIST.

A new, cheaper, and enlarged edition. Price 6s.
"One of the most remarkable autobiographies of recent years."
—New Age.
"Surely no novel ever dreamed of could be so thrilling as the life of this remarkable man."—Morning Leader.
"Should be widely read. Ostensibly autobiographical, it really gives a vivid picture of Russian social conditions."—Scotsman.

NEW SCIENTIFIC ROMANCE. AN EPISODE OF FLATLAND.

By C. H. HINTON. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

LABOUR AND CHILDHOOD.

By MARGARET MACMILLAN, Author of "Early Childhood," &c. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION OF COMMERCE AND BANKING.

By B. B. TURNER. Crown 8vo, paper, 1s. net.

LECTURES ON HUMANISM.

With Special Reference to its Bearings on Sociology. By J. S. MACKENZIE, M.A., Litt.D., Professor of Philosophy in University College, Cardiff; Author of "Outlines of Metaphysics," "Manual of Ethics," &c. Crown 8vo, cloth, 4s. 6d.

BEAUTY AND HEALTH IN YOUTH AND OLD AGE.

By Mrs. JOHN J. WEBSTER. Crown 8vo, 1s. 6d. net.

NOW READY, VOL. II. OF CAPITAL. Capitalist Circulation.

Translated from the German of KARL MARX by ERNEST UNTERMANN. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d.

THE ODES OF HORACE.

A Translation and an Exposition. By E. R. GARNSEY, B.A., Demy 8vo, 6s.

THE CERTAINTY OF RELIGION.

By F. STORRS TURNER. Fcap. 8vo, cloth, 2s. net.

NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION OF PICTURES OF THE SOCIALISTIC FUTURE.

Translated from the German of E. RICHTER. Paper, 1s. net.

SEX EQUALITY.

By EMMET DENSMORE, M.D., Author of "The Natural Food of Man," "How Nature Cures," &c. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

THE LIFE AND TIMES OF THE EMPRESS PULCHERIA.

By ADA B. TEETGEN. With nine Illustrations and Map. Demy 8vo, cloth, 10s. 6d.

Swan Sonnenschein & Co., Ltd., 25, High Street, Bloomsbury, W.C.

GEORGE ALLEN'S NEW BOOKS.

THE LETTERS OF S. REYNOLDS HOLE DEAN OF ROCHESTER.

Edited, with Memoir, by G. A. B. DEWAR, and Illustrated with Portraits and Sketches.

Demy 8vo, Cloth, 15s. net.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.—"A selection from the Dean's correspondence which admirably illustrates his character and throws fresh light on his various interests . . . will rank among the season's best books."

[Just out.]

EVERSLEY GARDENS AND OTHERS

By ROSE G. KINGSLEY. With Two Pictures in Colour, and 16 other Full-page Illustrations.

Crown 8vo, Cloth, gilt top, 6s. net.

In addition to the Chapters devoted to the art and practice of Gardening and the description of Bramshill, there are reminiscences of the author's father, CHARLES KINGSLEY.

[Just out.]

LIFE AND FLOWERS

By MAURICE MAETERLINCK. New Volume of Twelve Essays, translated by TEIXEIRA DE MATTOS.

Crown 8vo, Cloth, gilt top, 5s. net.

[Just out.]

THE HEART OF THE NORTHERN SEA

By ALVIDE PRYDZ, Author of "The Children of Hårø," "The Promised Land." Translated from the Fifth Norwegian Edition by JESSIE REW.

The story has been inspired by the wild scenery and the fisher people among whom the author has lived.

Crown 8vo, Cloth, 6s.

[Just out.]

HORTUS INCLUSUS: (POPULAR EDITION)

Messages from the Wood to the Garden.

By JOHN RUSKIN (Ruskin's Letters to the Misses Beever of the Thwaite, Coniston). With Preface and Facsimile of Ruskin's Last Letter.

Pott 8vo, Cloth, 1s. net; Leather, 1s. 6d. net.

[Just out.]

London: GEORGE ALLEN & SONS, 156, Charing Cross Road.

Price 6s. net.

DRAMATIC, LYRICAL, AND IDYLLIC POEMS.

By the Revd. THOS. TILSTON.

"Of genuine interest . . . marked by dignity of style, richness of thought and beauty of expression. (In 'The Sacrifice of Isaac') courage and strength are blended with delicacy of touch and sublimity of pathos. Some of the stanzas are particularly vivid and vigorous . . . breathes throughout a spirit of religiosity and hope. . . . The volume altogether is a very impressive one."—Layman.

"His work is marked by a dignity and scholarly finish in pleasing contrast to the slipshod doggerel which usually characterises the lyrical expression of sacred emotions. The lines are always easy and sonorous, and occasionally touch a high level."—The Outlook.

"Its author has endeavoured to produce the austerity and elevation of the Greek dramatists (in 'The Sacrifice of Isaac'). His success is ample and impressive. A cultured and refined mind, endowed with a fine sense of poetic form. Yet he can be intensely modern. There are palates which 'The Idol's Parliament' will tickle immensely. It is the most scathing and mordant bit of satire which we have lately hopped upon."—Yorkshire Post.

"Worthy ideals and a fluent and agreeable gift in many styles."—The Times.

"Work as good as it is varied, and its variety is only partially expressed in the title. A message to our times, yet we may confidently affirm that the poet is never submerged in the preacher. His poetry is poetry; its sole claim to recognition rests on this."—Glasgow Herald.

"Mr. Tilston's blank verse is dignified and restrained, and his lyrics are happy."—Tribune.

"A volume of undoubted power."—National Church.

SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, HAMILTON, KENT & CO.

THE NEW AGE:

An Independent Socialist Review of Politics, Literature and Art.

Edited by A. R. ORAGE and HOLBROOK JACKSON.

EVERY THURSDAY: ONE PENNY.

Write for Specimen Copy to MANAGER, 1 & 2, TOOK COURT, E.C.

- The Religion of the Post-Exilic Prophets. By Professor W. H. Bennett, Litt.D., D.D. (Clark.)
- The Second Volume (completing the work) of A Dictionary of Christ and the Gospels. Edited by J. Hastings, D.D. (Clark.)
- A New Dictionary of the Bible. Complete in 1 vol. Edited by J. Hastings, D.D. (Clark.)
- The Paradise and Garden of the Holy Fathers. Translated out of the Syriac. By E. A. W. Budge. 2 vols. (Chatto & Windus. 15s.)
- Christianity and the Social Order. By Rev. R. J. Campbell, M.A. (Chapman & Hall. 6s.)
- Jerusalem. The Topography, Economics, and History from the Earliest Times to 70 A.D. By the Rev. Professor G. A. Smith, D.D., LL.D. In 2 vols. (Hodder & Stoughton. Price 24s. net.)
- The Expositor's Greek Testament. Vol. IV. Edited by Rev. W. R. Nicoll, M.A., LL.D. 4 vols. Price to subscribers £3 net the set. Single vols. 28s. each. (Hodder & Stoughton.)
- Pauline Cities. By Professor Sir W. M. Ramsay, D.C.L., Litt.D., D.D. With maps and illustrations. (Hodder & Stoughton. 12s.)
- Positive Preaching and the Modern Mind. By the Rev. Principal P. T. Forsyth, D.D. (Hodder & Stoughton. 7s. 6d. net.)
- The Virgin Birth of Christ. By the Rev. Professor James Orr, M.A., D.D. (Hodder & Stoughton. 6s.)
- The Significance of New Testament History of Religious Principles. By the Rev. Principal A. M. Fairbairn, M.A., D.D., LL.D. (Hodder & Stoughton. 12s.)
- The Lord of Glory. By Rev. Professor B. B. Warfield, D.D. (Hodder & Stoughton. 6s. net.)
- Studies in the Inner Life of Jesus. By Rev. A. E. Garvie, D.D. (Hodder & Stoughton. 7s. 6d. net.)
- The Students' Old Testament. Vol. IV. Laws and Traditional Precedents. By Professor Charles Foster Kent, Ph.D. Complete in 6 vols. (Hodder & Stoughton. 12s. net each.)
- The Incarnation and Recent Criticism. By R. J. Cooke, D.D. (Hodder & Stoughton. 6s.)
- The Re-birth of Religion. By Dr. A. S. Crapsey. (Lane. 5s. net.)
- Lay Sermons and Addresses delivered in the Hall of Balliol College, Oxford. By Edward Caird, LL.D. (MacLehose. 6s. net.)
- The Church Pulpit Commentary. In 12 vols. (Nisbet.)
- Sin, Society, and the Saviour. By Father Bernard Vaughan, S.J. (Kegan Paul. 5s.)
- Churches Separated from Rome. By Mgr. Duchesne. Authorised Translation by A. H. Mathew. (Kegan Paul.)
- The Future Life and Modern Difficulties. By the Rev. F. C. Kempson, M.B. (Pitman. 3s. 6d. net.)
- The Religion and Worship of the Synagogue. An Introduction to the Study of Judaism from the New Testament Period. By W. O. E. Oesterley, B.D., and G. H. Box, M.A. (Pitman. 10s. 6d. net.)
- Talks on St. Luke's Gospel. By E. Stock. (Religious Tract Society. 3s. 6d.)
- Early Church Classics: St. Chrysostom on the Priesthood. By the Rev. T. A. Moxon. (S.P.C.K. 2s.)
- Luke the Physician. By Dr. A. Harnack, of Berlin. (Williams & Norgate.)
- The Apologetic of the New Testament. By the Rev. E. F. Scott, M.A. (Williams & Norgate.)
- The Clyde—River and Firth. Painted by Mary T. and J. Y. Hunter. (Black. 20s. net.)
- Kent. By W. Teignmouth Shore. Painted by W. B. Gardner. (Black. 20s. net.)
- The Riviera. Painted and Described by W. Scott. (Black. 20s. net.)
- Middlesex. Painted by John Fulleylove. Described by A. R. H. Moncrieff. (Black. 7s. 6d. net.)
- In the Land of Pearl and Gold: a Pioneer's Wanderings in the Back-blocks and Pearling Grounds of Australia and New Guinea. By A. Macdonald. (Blackie. 10s. 6d. net.)
- With Wolseley to Kumasi: a Story of the First Ashanti War. By Captain Brereton. (Blackie. 6s.)
- The High Tops of Black Mount. By the Marchioness of Breadalbane. (Blackwood. 6s. net.)
- In the Footsteps of Marco Polo. By Major C. A. Bruce. (Blackwood. 21s. net.)
- The Marches of Hindustan. By David Fraser. (Blackwood. 21s. net.)
- The Rhine. By H. J. Mackinder. Fully illustrated by Mrs. J. Jardine. (Chatto & Windus. 20s. net.)
- Cairo, Jerusalem, and Damascus: Three Chief Cities of the Egyptian Sultans. By D. S. Margoliouth. (Chatto & Windus. 20s. net.)
- Switzerland. By Clarence Rook. (Chatto & Windus. 20s. net.)
- Devon: its Moorlands, Streams, and Coasts. By Lady Rosalind Northcote. Fully illustrated. (Chatto & Windus. 20s. net.)
- Lisbon and Cintra. By A. C. Inchbold. Illustrated. (Chatto & Windus. 10s. 6d. net.)
- From the Foreland to Penzance. By C. Holland. Illustrated. (Chatto & Windus. 10s. 6d. net.)
- Ice-Bound Heights of the Mustagh. By Fanny Bullock Workman and W. H. Workman. (Constable. 21s. net.)
- Greece and the Ægean Islands. By P. S. Marden. (Constable. 12s. 6d. net.)
- Wanderings in Arabia. By C. M. Doughty. 2 vols. With a Portrait and Map. (Duckworth. 16s. net.)
- Old and New Japan. By C. Holland. Coloured Illustrations by M. Smyth. (Dent. 15s. net.)
- Cities of Italy. By A. Symons. (Dent. 4s. 6d. net.)
- Romantic Essex. By R. A. Beckett. (Dent. 2s. net.)
- The Long Labrador Trail. By Dillon Wallace. (Hodder & Stoughton. 7s. 6d.)
- Mandalay, and other Cities of Burma. By V. C. Scott O'Connor. (Hutchinson. 21s. net.)
- In Wildest Africa. By C. G. Schillings. Translated by F. Whyte. (Hutchinson. 24s. net.)
- George Grenfell and the Congo. By Sir Harry Johnston, G.C.M.C., K.C.B. (Hutchinson. 30s. net.)
- In the Strange South Seas. By Beatrice Grimshaw. (Hutchinson. 16s. net.)
- In and Around the Isle of Purbeck. By Ida Woodward. (Lane. 21s. net.)
- Newfoundland and its Untrodden Ways. By J. G. Millais. (Longmans.)
- A Woman's Trek from Cape to Cairo. By M. Hall. (Methuen. 16s. net.)
- The Complete Mountaineer. By G. D. Abraham. (Methuen. 15s. net.)
- With the Border Ruffians. Memories of the Far West, 1852-1868. By R. H. Williams. Edited by E. W. Williams. (Murray.)
- Over-Sea Britain. By E. F. Knight. (Murray. 6s.)
- Queer Things About Persia. By E. de Lorey and D. Sladen. (E. Nash. 21s. net.)
- Castles and Chateaux of Old Touraine and the Loire Country. By Francis Miltoun, with Illustrations produced from Paintings made on the Spot by Blanche McManus. (Pitman. 7s. 6d. net.)
- Cathedrals and Cloisters of Midland France. By E. W. Rose and V. H. Francis. (Putnams. 21s. net.)
- Nooks and Corners of Old Paris. By G. Cain. Translated by F. Lawton. Illustrated. (Grant Richards.)
- The Cradle of the Deep. By Sir F. Treves. (Smith, Elder. 12s. net.)
- The Brahmans, Theists, and Muslims of India. By J. C. Oman. (Unwin. 14s. net.)
- The Matterhorn. By Guido Rey. (Unwin. 21s. net.)
- The Scenery of Sherwood Forest. By J. Rodgers. (Unwin. 21s. net.)

TRAVEL AND TOPOGRAPHY.

- In the Track of R. L. Stevenson and elsewhere in Old France. By J. A. Hammerton. (Arrowsmith.)
- From the Niger to the Nile. By Boyd Alexander. (Arnold. 36s. net.)
- Turkey in Europe. By Sir Charles Eliot. (Arnold. 7s. 6d. net.)
- Mexico of the Twentieth Century. By Percy F. Martin. (Arnold. 30s. net.)
- Across Persia. By E. Crawshaw Williams. (Arnold. 12s. 6d. net.)
- The Itinerary of John Leland. Vol. II. Newly edited by Lucy Toulmin Smith. (Bell.)

THE "R.T.S." NEW LIST

JUST READY.—Crown 8vo, Cloth Gilt, Gilt Top, 6s. With Eleven Illustrations by HAROLD COPPING.

Ian Maclaren's NEW BOOK, ST. JUDE'S.

The British Weekly says:—"In literary power, 'St. Jude's,' is equal to the best of Dr. Watson's writings."

The Daily News says:—"In this book there is that sense for the minutiae of humour that has pleased thousands of readers."

The Liverpool Post says:—"In this volume we seem to see Dr. Watson standing revealed before us on every page. . . . He realised the beauty of the humdrum; he saw heroisms where we all are too blind to them. He took the standpoint of the lover of humanity frankly and courageously."

The Glasgow News says:—"There are lights and shadows, tragedy and comedy, numerous fine touches in this volume, and a deal of the pathos which abounded in the Drumtochty stories."

The Glasgow Herald says:—"The pathos is secured by a deft whittling process of idealisation, and by a delicate garnishing of humour."

THE BOY'S OWN ANNUAL for 1907.

832 pages of Reading and Pictures. With 11 Coloured Plates, and upwards of 500 other Pictures. Large Demy 4to, 8/-, in hand-ome cloth, gilt.

THE BOY'S OWN ANNUAL contains 10 Long Stories; 40 Shorter Stories; 23 Adventures; 20 Cricket Papers; 10 Football Papers; 15 Gardening Papers; 16 Outdoor Amusements; 13 Outdoor Sports; 1 Papers on Rabbits, Dogs and other Pets; and a host of other eye-opening, mind-forming, idle-hand employing, helpful papers for boys of all ages.

THE GIRL'S OWN ANNUAL for 1907.

832 pages of interesting and Useful Reading, profusely illustrated with Tinted and other Pictures. Demy 4to, 8/-, in handsome cloth, gilt.

THE GIRL'S OWN ANNUAL contains Long Stories by HELEN MARION BURNSIDE, RAYMOND JACBERNS, MARION LADY DUNBOYNE, LESLIE KEITH, LILIAN STREET, ESME STUART; 25 Shorter Stories by Lady William Lennox, Rosa N. Carey, Mary Bradford Whiting, Ida Lemon, Eglanton Thorne, Helen Protheroe Lewis, Frances C. Houston, and other well-known writers; 12 Papers on How a Girl should Dress; 6 on Wild Flower Collecting; 5 on Easy Book-binding; 4 on Embroidery, 4 on Gardening, and a great variety of other helpful papers for sensible girls; Loving Counsel, Needlework, Education, Cookery, Nursing, Travelling, Health and Beauty, Singing, Art, etc.

OLD THEOLOGY RE-STATED.

By Rev. E. J. KENNEDY. Crown 8vo., Cloth Gilt, 3/6. With Photogravure portrait of author.

In this volume the Rev. E. J. Kennedy gives the substance of a series of sermons on the Epistle to the Ephesians, preached by him at Boscombe. Whilst dealing simply and forcibly with the central point of doctrine suggested by the Epistle, Mr. Kennedy draws out with power and clearness the practical sides of the Apostle's letter, as applicable to the social and personal life of Christian people to-day.

TALKS ON ST. LUKE'S GOSPEL.

By EUGENE STOCK. Large Crown 8vo, Cloth Gilt, 3/6.

Whilst particularly suited for those who have to prepare for the instruction of others, the book will make an invaluable companion to those who read it in a devotional spirit for their personal profit.

ADDITIONS TO THE DEVOTIONAL COMMENTARY.

THE FIRST EPISTLE TO TIMOTHY:

A Devotional Commentary by The Rev. T. A. GURNEY, M.A., LL.B., Crown 8vo, Cloth Gilt, 2/-

JUST READY.

GENESIS: A Devotional Commentary.

Volume I. Chapters I.-XXV. By the Rev. W. H. GRIFFITH THOMAS, D.D., Principal of Wycliffe Hall, Oxford. Large Crown 8vo, Cloth Gilt, 2s.

The Scotsman says:—"It will prove suggestive to Bible students as expounding this part of scripture in a spirit noticeably distinct from that in which it is usually approached by modern theologians of the critical sort."

The Spectator says:—"The treatment is not critical, but the reader is referred to representative works which give the two sides."

The Schoolmaster says:—"We have tested this book from a teacher's standpoint, and found it to be a mine of suggestion."

JUST READY. Large Crown 8vo, Cloth Gilt, 3s. 6d.

FIFTY-TWO NATURE RAMBLES.

A Series of Open-Air Talks for Young People. By W. PERCIVAL WESTELL, F.L.S., M.B.O.U., Author of "Every Boy's Book of British Natural History, etc." With Five Coloured Plates, and One Hundred other illustrations.

The Tribune says:—"It is well calculated to awaken and stimulate in growing youngsters a desire to understand the open-air wonders of nature."

The Daily Chronicle says:—"The pictures are really too lovely for description."

The Schoolmistress says:—"No better prize book could be found for either boy or girl."

The Morning Post says:—"It will certainly prove very pleasing to any boy or girl with a relish for rural delights."

A New Book by the Author of "About Peggy Saville."

THE FORTUNES OF THE FARRELLS.

By Mrs. GEORGE de HORNE VAIZEY, Author of "About Peggy Saville," "Pixie O'Shaugnessy," "Betty Trevor," etc. With Seven Illustrations by W. H. C. Groome. Large Crown 8vo, Cloth Gilt, 3/6. ("Alexandra Library," No 8.)

A New Book by DR. GORDON STABLES, R.N.

THE VOYAGE OF "THE BLUE VEGA."

By Dr. GORDON STABLES, R.N.

With Six Illustrations by Alfred Pearse. Large Crown 8vo, Cloth Gilt, 3/6 ("Boy's Library of Adventure and Heroism," No. 11.)

THE RELIGIOUS TRACT SOCIETY, 4, Bouverie Street, E.C.

T. FISHER UNWIN. ——— T. FISHER UNWIN

HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, &c.

Studies of the Eighteenth Century in Italy.

By VERNON LEE. New Edition, with a new Preface, a Photogravure Frontispiece, and 40 other Illustrations selected by Dr. Guido Biagi. Super royal 8vo, Half-bound. 21s. net.

Before and After Waterloo.

By EDWARD STANLEY, sometime Bishop of Norwich. Edited by J. H. ADEANE and MAUD GRENFELL. Illustrated. Demy 8vo. 18s. net.

Studies Historical and Critical.

By Professor PASQUALE VILLARI, Author of "Girolamo Savonarola," &c. With seven Photogravure Plates. Demy 8vo, 15s. net.

The Letters of Edward Lear.

(Author of the "The Book of Nonsense") to Chichester Fortescue, Lord Carlingford, and Frances, Countess Waldegrave (1848 to 1864). Edited by LADY STRACHEY (of Sutton Court). With a Photogravure Frontispiece. Three Coloured Plates and many other Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 15s. net.

Mirabeau the Demi-God.

Being the True and Romantic Story of his Life and Adventures. By W. R. H. TROWBRIDGE, Author of "Court Beauties of Old Whitehall," "A Girl of the Multitude," &c., &c. Illustrated. Demy 8vo, 15s. net.

A Literary History of France.

By EMILE FAGUET, Member of the French Academy. With Photogravure Frontispiece. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. (Library of Literary History.)

A Literary History of the Arabs.

By R. A. NICHOLSON, M.A. With Photogravure Frontispiece. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. (Library of Literary History.)

Forty Years of Paris.

By W. F. LONERGAN, Author of "The New Parisian," &c. With 32 Portraits of Leading Frenchmen. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

A Sister of Marie Antoinette.

The Life Story of Maria Carolina, Queen of Naples. By Mrs. BEARNE, Author of "A Leader of Society at Napoleon's Court," "Lives of the Early Valois Queens," &c., &c. Fully Illustrated. Large crown, 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

Old English Sports.

By F. W. HACKWOOD. With Six Coloured Plates and 32 other full-page Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

History in Scott's Novels.

By the Hon. A. S. G. CANNING, Author of "Shakespeare Studied in Six Plays," &c. Second Edition, Revised. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

Bonaparte, in Egypt and the Egyptians of To-day.

By HAJI A. BROWNE. With Frontispiece. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

History of Ancient Civilization.

By CHARLES SEIGNOBOS. Large crown 8vo, 5s. net.

A Short History of Indian Literature.

By ERNEST HORRITZ. With an Introduction by Professor T. W. RHYS DAVIDS. Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

Memorials of Thomas Davidson the Wandering Scholar.

Collected and Edited by WILLIAM KNIGHT, LL.D., formerly Professor of Moral Philosophy in the University of St. Andrews. With a Portrait. 7s. 6d. net.

Sir Rowland Hill.

The Story of a Great Reform. Told by his Daughter. With 17 Illustrations. Large crown 8vo, 5s. net.

TRAVEL AND DESCRIPTION.

The Brahmins, Theists, and Muslins of India.

By JOHN CAMPBELL OMAN, D.Lit., Author of "The Mystics, Ascetics, and Saints of India," "Indian Life: Religious and Social," &c. Illustrated. Medium 8vo, 14s. net.

The Matterhorn.

By GUIDO REY. Illustrated by EDOARDO RUBINO. With a Preface by EDMONDO DE AMICIS. Translated from the Italian by J. E. C. EATON. With 14 Coloured Plates, 23 Pen Drawings, and 11 Photographs. Super royal 8vo, 21s. net. Fine Paper Edition (limited to 15 copies). Price on application.

The Andes and the Amazon.

Life and Travel in Peru. By C. REGINALD ENOCK, F.R.G.S. With a Map and numerous Illustrations. Medium 8vo, 21s.

The Palaces of Crete and their Builders.

By ANGELO MOSSO, Author of "The Life of Man on the High Alps." With 187 Illustrations and two Plans. Royal 8vo, 21s.

THE SOUTH-AMERICAN SERIES.

EDITED BY MARTIN HUME.

Vol. I. Chile.

By G. F. SCOTT-ELLIOT, F.R.G.S. With an introduction by MARTIN HUME. Illustrated. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

Romola.

By GEORGE ELIOT. A Historically Illustrated edition. Edited, with introduction and Notes, by GUIDO BIAGI, Librarian of the Laurentian and Ricciardi Libraries, Florence. With 160 Illustrations. Large crown 8vo, two Vols., 5s. net each.

Byron in Italy.

A Selection of Poems and Letters Relating to his Life in Italy. Edited by ANNA BENNESON McMAHAN. With more than 60 Illustrations from Photographs. Large crown 8vo, 5s. net.

CHILDREN'S BOOKS.

The Enchanted Castle.

By E. NESBIT. With 48 Illustrations by H. R. MILLAR. Large crown 8vo, 6s.

Milly and Olly; or, a Holiday Among the Mountains.

By Mrs. HUMPHRY WARD. With 40 Illustrations by WILLY POGANY. New Edition. 6s.

The Welsh Fairy Book.

Edited by W. JENKYN THOMAS. With a Coloured Frontispiece and about 200 Illustrations by WILLY POGANY. Small demy 8vo, 6s.

The Adventures of a Dodo.

By G. E. FARROW, Author of "The Wallpug of Why," &c. With 70 Illustrations by WILLY POGANY. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

RELIGION AND PHILOSOPHY.

Ancient Egypt, the Light of the World.

A Work of Reclamation and Restoration, in Twelve Books. By GERALD MASSEY, Author of "A Book of the Beginnings" and "The Natural Genesis." With Diagrams. Two Vols. Super Royal 8vo, 42s. net.

The New Appreciation of the Bible.

A Study of the Spiritual Outcome of Biblical Criticism. By W. C. SELLECK. D.D. Crown 8vo, 6s. 6d. net.

What is Religion?

By Professor W. BOUSSET, Author of "Life of Jesus." Translated by F. F. LOW. With an Introduction. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

The Golden Sayings of the Blessed Brother Giles of Assisi.

Newly Translated and Edited, together with a Sketch of his Life, by FATHER PASCHAL ROBINSON, of the Orders of Friars Minor. With six Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

Christianity and its Bible.

By HENRY F. WARING. Large crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net.

The Religious Crisis in France.

By the Abbé ALBERT HOUTIN. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

MISCELLANEOUS.

The Town Child.

By REGINALD A. BRAY, L.C.C., Author of "The Children of the Town," "In the Heart of the Empire," &c. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

The British City.

By F. C. HOWE, Author of "The City, the Hope of Democracy." Large crown 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

Poems by Giosuè Carducci.

Selected and Translated, and with an Introduction by MAUD HOLLAND. Crown 8vo, half parchment, 5s. net.

Friyola, Simon Ryan, and other Papers.

By AUGUSTUS JESSOP, D.D. Crown 8vo, limp cloth, 3s. 6d.

Last Hours with Nature.

By MRS. BRIGHTWEN, F.Z.S., F.E.S. Author of "Wild Nature Won by Kindness," &c., &c. Edited by W. H. CHESSON. Illustrated by THEO CARRERAS. Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

THE VIERGE "DON QUIXOTE."

DON QUIXOTE

By MIGUEL DE CERVANTES.

With 260 Drawings by DANIEL VIERGE 4 vols., super royal 8vo. Edition limited to 155 copies. £15 net.

Fine Edition, limited to 10 Copies, on Imperial Japan Paper, with extra set of Full-page Plates. £30 net.

Illustrated Prospectus Free on Application.

Please write for a copy of Mr. Unwin's New Announcement List. Free on Application.

T. FISHER UNWIN. ——— T. FISHER UNWIN.

"THE NATION," with which is incorporated "The Speaker," printed for the Proprietors by the NATIONAL PRESS AGENCY LIMITED, Whitefriars House, London, E.C., and Published by THE SPEAKER PUBLISHING COMPANY, LIMITED, at the Offices, 14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, London, W.C. Registered at the General Post Office as a Newspaper.—SATURDAY, OCTOBER 12, 1907.

UNIVERSITY OF ILLINOIS-URBANA

3 0112 003024723